Beverly Abramson

Photo exhibit explores lives outside our own experience

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO— Beverley Abramson's deepening awareness cuts through her camera lens to find the striving, the moments of bliss and scenes of contentment in the divergent cultures of Israel and Mexico.

Her exhibition of black and white photographs, like short stories, involve us in lives which may be within or outside our experience.

The man in the foreground is absorbed in his newspaper, the others lean back, peacefully doing nothing. They aren't bored; there is simply a sense that they have earned their rest. The setting is Gordon Beach, Tel Aviv, but it could just as easily be Miami Beach, Fla. ocean to Mexico. See and feel both poverty and tenderness.

TERESA is the unmarried relative who lives with her brother's family in San Sebastian Abasolo, scrambling to help earn a living and Abramson notes that even amid their poverty, the villagers of San Sebastian Abasolo choose to have pets. In MARINO, Teresa's husky teenage nephew is seen gently cradling a small rabbit in his arms.

TURKEY DINNER focusing on several recently hatched turkeys crowded around a dish of grain, suggests that while these youngsters are now enjoying their dinner they will, as adults, themselves become turkey dinner!

The exhibition running until Feb. 20 at the Koffler Centre of the Arts (4588 Bathurst St. 416-636-1880) honours the memory of Nate Katz, Irving Strom and Lance Barash.

Abramson's experience in reportage and fine art photography has paved the way for a new enterprise – portraits of families, children, pets and executives.

ABSOLUT BLISS is in total contrast to BEACH BOYS. On Tel Aviv's Nachalat Binyamin, a scruffy, long-haired imbiber, his jacket over pyjamas, tilts a bottle of vodka to his open mouth. For the moment he is in a happy world of his own but where does he go from here and where does he sleep tonight?

ROMEO AND JULIET (Omar and Nadia), a very young boy and girl, face each other joyfully against the sweep of the Judean Desert. They are the children of Bedouin shepherds and in anticipation of Abramson's visit, they have dressed their best.

Abramson has brought some bright red nail polish for Nadia who has insisted that it be applied before the picture is shot. Although she wears a pretty blouse and skirt, she is capable of hefting a grown sheep with ease.

Now, travel across land and giving of herself to the children.

The struggle and love are in her face. Chickens and turkeys run in and out of the house scarcely noticed but Teresa has her own pet pig.

Israel & the Jewish World

Argentina vows to solve bombings

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

STOCKHOLM — Argentine President Fernando de la Rua has promised the Israeli minister of Diaspora affairs, Michael Melchior, that he will try to expedite investigations into two bombings of Jewish sites in Buenos Aires.

In 1992, 29 people were killed when the Israeli Embassy was bombed; and there were 86 fatalities following the 1994 bombing of a Jewish community centre.

Nobody has been convicted in either case, and Israeli officials have criticized the way the Argentine authorities have conducted the investigations. Foreign Minister David Levy called them "an open sore."

Others have blamed close economic ties with Iran for the apparent Argentine apathy. Judicial authorities in Argentina have linked Iranian-backed groups to the bombings.

The pledge was made to Melchior when he met with de la Rua last week in Stockholm at an international conference on preserving the memory of the Holocaust.

Melchior said de la Rua's offer showed that the new president was determined to "build a new image of Argentina and fight against anti-Semitism."

The pledge showed courage, Melchior said in a phone interview. "Coming to Stockholm was not easy for him."

An Argentine government report has said that at least 9,000 Argentines "disappeared" after being arrested by the military regime. Human rights groups say the true figure is closer to 30,000.

Argentine Jews estimate that at least 1,500 of those who "disappeared" are Jews.

There were a significant number of Jews among the junta's perceived opponents, although some were targeted by authorities as much for their Jewishness as for their opposition to the regime.

Jews were often singled out for rougher treatment at detention camps by military personnel who openly espoused anti-Semitic doctrines.

Melchior said the main goal now is to track down the bodies to give them a proper Jewish burial, and to provide the families with a sense of closure.

Melchior quoted de la Rua as saying he would try to amend Argentine law to make it possible to bring those responsible to justice, and to offer immunity to former officials of the military regime who are prepared to testify against them.

STILL IN CUSTODY: Daniel Weiz, a suspect in the murder of Matti Baranovski in Toronto, appeared in a Jerusalem court last week where he was told that he would be held in custody until his formal extradition hearing. [Israel photo]

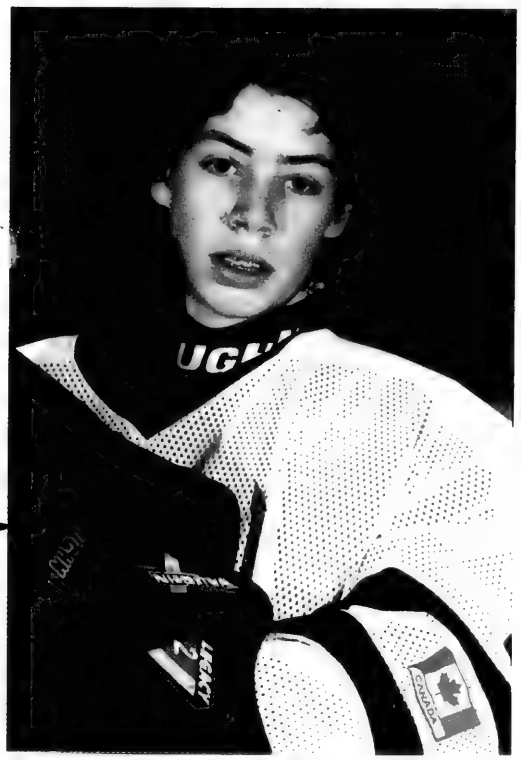
Gherson played in world under-17 tournament

Star goalie a prospect for OHL's Sarnia Sting



Robert Gherson

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Not many youngsters pushing 16 have to make decisions that may affect the rest of their lives. Most are more concerned with less weighty matters, like school, sports and girls. But when you're an exceptional athlete, you're also an exception to the rule.

Toronto native Robert Gherson is a star goalie with a bright future, who will soon be faced with the tough decision of whether to play next year in the Ontario Hockey League (OHL) or to hold out for the offer of a college scholarship.

Gherson stops pucks for the Wellington Dukes, a team in the Provincial Junior "A" Hockey League (OHA) but last year, as a bantam, he was drafted by the Sarnia Sting.

The Sting have expressed an interest in him suiting up with them next season, and it appears they're willing to give him lots of ice time as a rookie. But there's always the chance of being offered a scholarship to an NCAA school in the United States, and so he must ponder his options.

When you have the kind of talent Gherson possesses, you can sit back and let the offers come to you. Gherson, who played for Ontario at the World Under-17 Championship in Timmins last December, has been courted by a number of big name sports agents who want to add him to their stable of talent. Following an interview with The CJN, Robert and his father Maurice, were scheduled to meet with a high profile agent who represents numerous NHL stars.

Gherson admits he's faced with lots of decisions, "but I don't think about it too much. I rely on my coach and my dad."

Last year, playing bantam AAA for the Toronto Marlboroughs, was even more stressful. Undrafted at the time, Gherson was aware that the stands were usually full of junior scouts.

"It was so weird, thinking about a team that might want to draft you," he said. "This year, it's easier not worrying about being drafted."

So far this season, Gherson has racked up a 2.72 goals against average and three shutouts while playing in most of his team's big games.

His goaltending coach, Jon Elkin, has worked with Gherson since he was nine and believes the youngster "is a top prospect for his age. He made the under-17 team as one of the top two goaltenders his age in Ontario. He's a prospect for the NHL draft (in 2002), but that's a long way off.

"He has the capability to do something special in hockey."

Gherson, who stands six feet tall and weighs 140 lbs., "is quick and he has good focus," Elkin said. "He's very good under pressure. He has tremendous ability to stop the puck, due to his athletic ability."

Elkin, who serves as goalie coach for the NHL's Calgary Flames, and who runs his own hockey school, believes Gherson should flourish if he decides to play in Sarnia next year.

"He was drafted into a good situation. He's their guy. They're focused on him and that will give him a good opportunity."

Under Elkin's tutelage, Gherson has adopted the butterfly style perfected by goalies in Quebec, and which reached a pinnacle with future Hall-of-Famer Patrick Roy. Goalies using the butterfly rely on good positioning to face the shooter, cover the lower part of the net from post to post with the pads, and wait for the shooter to make the first move.

"I don't react as fast, but I'm patient and usually I have good positioning," Gherson said. "I'm also a good skater."

In the rough and tumble OHA, which makes the NHL and the OHL seem like the ice capades, "aggressive," if not outright dirty hockey, still rules. Games against arch rival and division leaders Lindsay are particularly tough. Lindsay, which has a league-wide reputation for instigating fights against opponents' top players to get them out of the game, also has a history of attempts to intimidate the goaltender.

"They bump you and try to get you off your game," Gherson said. "In one game against Lindsay, one of their players slashed me with a two-hander on the wrist. They scored and the linesmen saw the slash, but the goal counted."

In an average game, Gherson faces 25 shots. Shooters in junior A are better than those in bantam and they're much better skaters, he's learned.

Gherson had a good start to the year and based on his play, was invited to try out for the under-17 team. He made the team but got into only one exhibition against Finland and a tournament game versus Team Atlantic, which Ontario won 11-2. Sitting on the bench, he watched Ontario lose 2-0 to Russia in the final.

The Russians played a very determined defensive style, pulling all five skaters back into their end on Ontario forays and crowding the front of the net, giving the Canadians very little to shoot at, he said.

"We couldn't get any quality shots. Plus, we were really tired. We had played the United States the day before and won in a shootout. We played four games in four days."

Gherson is already looking forward to the playoffs (the Dukes sit in second place) and afterwards to a busy summer of workouts and preparation for Sarnia's camp. He's also looking forward to trying out for next year's Under-18 team and another chance to represent his province. Ultimately, he'd love to fulfill a childhood dream and play in the NHL.

"I've always believed in myself. I never believe something's impossible. But I've got to work really hard," he said.

Warming up for Team Ontario

The Inside Back

Stockholm Syndrome

Canada's wholly unsatisfactory response to the United Nations on the subject of Ontario's discriminatory school funding policy (see page 3) came on the heels of another statement Ottawa issued at the end of the recent Stockholm conference on Holocaust education, remembrance and research – this one only slightly more gratifying, but only because it was re-drafted at least twice.

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

First, it should be noted that among the 46 countries at the historic conference, Canada was among those left off a list of delegates who made oral statements. My sources tell me this greatly upset and embarrassed Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, who led the 10-member Canadian team. Gray reportedly demanded an explanation from our embassy in Stockholm, whose response is unavailable.

Of the countries that did address the conference directly, many either apologized outright for their inaction or their miserly immigration quotas during the Holocaust, or read out a list of their failings and inaction during the period. This would have afforded Canada the perfect opportunity to explain its dismal none-is-too-many policy on Jewish immigration before, during and even after the war.

At any event, Canada ended up drafting a final written statement a little over a page long. The original document, which landed on my desk last week, reads as though it was scribbled on a cocktail napkin at the 11th hour. It's a bland paean to multiculturalism that notes Canada's commitments to UN covenants on genocide and throws in some platitudes about the importance of the Holocaust as a touchstone for further understanding.

There's no reference to Canadian history, no reference to our record on prosecuting war criminals. And while the draft says that "Canada has identified as one of its first steps, the development of a systematic Canada-wide study of Holocaust education in our 10 provinces and territories," it then admits that this study won't be conducted by Canada at all, but rather by B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights!

To his credit, Gray rolled up his sleeves and sat down with MP and delegation co-chair Irwin Cotler; Moshe Ronen and Nate Leipciger of Canadian Jewish Congress; Rochelle Wilner and Karen Mock of B'nai Brith; and human rights advocate David Matas, and rewrote the draft late into the night.

The result was a document more than twice as long that excised nothing from the original, but added paragraphs citing Canada's closed-door war-era immigration policy on Jews, and (at the insistence of Matas) one on the need to learn the fate of Swedish war hero, Raoul Wallenberg, who rescued more Jews from Hitler than did Canada, and is Canada's only honorary citizen.

Because many more cooks were contributing to the stew, the document was also to contain a reference to the fact that it was not until 1987 that Canada enacted legislation to bring Nazi war criminals to justice (the implication being: shame on Canada). But my copy of the second draft shows this entry as scratched out.

Gray, Cotler, Ronen and Leipciger left the conference before it ended, and Ronen, at least, was surprised to learn, upon his return to Toronto, that the final, final document issued by Canada left out two things: The paragraph stating that Canada could have done more to save refugees fleeing the Holocaust, and, to Matas's dismay, the one on Raoul Wallenberg.

Matas is a circumspect fellow. He displayed no anger at the exclusion of the Wallenberg reference (a few years ago, armed with a government grant, he conducted extensive research into Wallenberg's fate). He did say, last week, that Ottawa simply "wasn't in a position to make a bolder statement."

But he did rue the fact that Canada did not confront its past at the conference and did not show initiative to do more than the minimum.

Ronen, for his part, was more direct in his assessment. Although he welcomed the opportunity to help redraft the Canadian statement, he said it was probably a good thing Canada did not contribute to the conference's final declaration because if it had, that too would have been watered down.

About Seniors

Dr. Mark says...

By DR. MARK CLARFIELD

Last Scene of all,
That ends this strange eventful history,
In second childishness, and mere oblivion,
Sans teeth, sans eye, sans taste, sans everything.
Shakespeare

As described by the Bard, those at the extremes of life have much in common.

Increasingly, I am struck by the similarities exhibited by patients at the extremes of life.

Both exhibit an easy perturbation from the physiological norms of maturity.

Poor demographic planning links the young and the old. The baby boom arrived quite unexpectedly. By the same token, we should have foreseen the arrival of the elderly since they have been with us at least since birth. But suddenly we are scrambling to build enough nursing homes.

Clinically, the very old and young have much in common. For one thing, they are both not built of the same stuff as adults.

For example, at birth, babies are wetter than adults: total body water comprising 75 percent of body weight. At the other end of the age spectrum, elders tend to desiccation.

Medications can present a problem to both. Although the problem has not been entirely solved for children, at least it is now well recognized. But for the older patient, physicians frequently do not adjust dosages taking into account age-related (let alone disease-produced) organ changes.

Perhaps the place where the situation of the young and old come together with the greatest irony occurs as one reaches middle age. We are often still responsible (hopefully decreasingly) for growing children at the same time as we become more concerned about our parents' problems.

Ours is the sandwich generation.

It is this pressured situation that frequently bedevils Canadians in the prime of life. (And keep in mind that proportionately Canada's Jews are much older than the rest of our fellow citizens.) This situation brings to mind a most instructive riddle. Why do grandchildren and grandparents get along so well? Answer: Because they have an enemy in common.

TSO may boycott Vienna concerts

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Politics and culture are proving to be a volatile combination in the wake of the election of Joerg Haider's far-right Freedom Party in Austria.

Last weekend, musicians from the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO) met informally to discuss a possible boycott of three Viennese concert dates scheduled for early March.

Jacques Israelievitch, the orchestra's concertmaster, announced that he will not participate in any concerts in Austria, while associate concertmaster Mark Skazinetsky told The CJN he was planning to make a similar announcement.

"It would be a problem" for the orchestra if both he and Israelievitch decline to play, Skazinetsky said. "It would not be impossible to play, but it would be difficult."

Richard Cohen, who plays the French horn, said he hoped the orchestra would boycott the Vienna dates, but he would perform if the majority of musicians voted to play. Other musicians, Jewish and non-Jewish, are also considering boycotting the Vienna appearances, they said.

The concerts are the last three dates on the orchestra's Euro Tour 2000, which includes performances in Budapest, Stuttgart, Cologne, Frankfurt and Berlin. The tour was undertaken with the support of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) and other, private sector backers.

The weekend meeting, organized by the musicians and attended by about 60, canvassed the performers' opinions about the Vienna dates.

Though no collective decision has yet been taken, "there is grave concern," Israelievitch said. "We're trying to figure out what to do about it. I personally don't want to play there. I'm sure I'm not alone.

LOBBYING FOR AN EXIT FROM LEBANON: Members of the Four Mothers organization demonstrated last week outside the Defense Ministry following the killing of 19-year-old Amir Meir in south Lebanon. In the photo at left is a soldier being consoled at Meir's funeral. Three days after Meir was killed, 19-year-old Tsachi Itach was also killed in south Lebanon. A spokesman for the prime minister reiterated the government's intention to extracate all troops from Lebanon by July.

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC 'Dismayed'

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress says it reacted with "dismay" on learning that Karl-Heinz Grasser, a prominent member of Austria's ultra-right Freedom Party and the country's incoming finance minister was the chief spokesperson for Magna International in Austria. "We are troubled to learn that there was this association," said CJC president Moshe Ronen. "Magna is a major Canadian multinational headed by a prominent Austro-Canadian [Frank Stronach] with the highest reputation." CJC added that it hopes Magna "can play a constructive role in bringing about the diminution of the Freedom Party's influence and role in Austria's political life."

Protest at Consulate

TORONTO — Rabbi Gunther Plaut will be one of the guest speakers at a rally this Sunday, Feb. 20, to protest the inclusion of Joerg Haider's Freedom Party in the new Austrian coalition government. The protest, under the auspices of B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadian Zionist Federation and the Zionist Youth Movements of Canada, will take place at 11 a.m. outside the Austrian Consulate, 360 Bay St.

ISRAEL

Rabbi Invites Pope

JERUSALEM — Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi has called on Pope John Paul II to meet him at his office when the pontiff visits Israel in March. Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau rejected a planned itinerary for the Pope, which called for them to meet at the Western Wall, saying going to meet him at the Wall's outdoor plaza would be "demeaning" for Rabbi Lau. Asked what would happen if the pontiff refused to come to his office, Rabbi Lau said in a television interview, "If he cannot come, we wish him all the best."

Tourism Up

JERUSALEM — Tourism to Israel increased by 17 percent in 1999 over the previous year to nearly 2.25 million tourists, according to data released by the Central Bureau of Statistics last week. Israel's tourism ministry forecasts that millennium events, including a planned visit by Pope John Paul II in March, will boost tourist visits to as high as three million this year.

Petition Rejected

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice rejected a petition filed by convicted spy Jonathan Pollard to compel the Jewish state to secure his immediate release and to see to all his medical and financial needs. The judges decided that while they believe Israel will do everything possible to seek his release, they saw no legal reason to interfere.

WORLD

Austria Protests

VIENNA — An umbrella group of European rabbis is moving its March conference from Vienna to protest the inclusion of the extremist Freedom Party in the Austrian government. The Conference of European Rabbis said it does not feel comfortable meeting in Austria as long as the party headed by Joerg Haider is part of the ruling coalition.

Also last week, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre said it would cancel a joint project with Austrian youth, and Andras Schiff, a Hungarian-born pianist said he will refuse to play a concert at the Austrian Embassy in Washington. Schiff said that as an Austrian citizen and a European Jew he is "deeply upset" by the inclusion of Haider's party in the Austrian government.

Chechen Jew Freed

MOSCOW — Roman Ashurov, 61, a Jewish resident of Chechnya who was held hostage by Chechen guerrillas for more than a year, was recently freed. Several other Jews are still in Chechen captivity.

Jews Under Suspicion

BERLIN — Germany is investigating two Jewish members of the World War II resistance on charges they attempted to poison more than 2,000 imprisoned SS veterans after the war, according to the Times of London. The allegations against Leipke Distel, 77, and Joseph Harmatz, 74, have prompted neo-Nazi groups to say they will cover the costs of any former SS workers who come forward to testify. The two men were members of a Jewish group known as the Avengers.

Commandments Bill

INDIANAPOLIS — Indiana's House of Representatives has overwhelmingly passed a bill allowing the Ten Commandments to be posted in government buildings and schools. The House forwarded the bill to the state Senate, which has already approved a similar measure.

Canada: Austria 'On Probation'

OTTAWA — Canada will strictly limit bilateral contacts with Austria, putting that country's coalition government "on probation," Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy said last week.

Following meetings with Jaime Gama, Portugal's foreign minister, and Christopher Patten, commissioner for external affairs of the European Union, Axworthy said Canada will follow the EU's lead on Austria.

"We had discussions with a number of other countries," Axworthy said. "We felt the proper message has to be sent – that there are standards which must be adhered to and that we are not going any further than what the union limits on those diplomatic, political engagements."

He said he wants to see what the new Austrian government does before considering any tougher sanctions.

Patten said Haider remains an unknown quantity. "None of us know whether he's simply a populist extremist who's made a few cheap remarks or whether there is something more consistent and sinister about his position. We'll see in the next few weeks, I guess."

Anti-Semitism, hate on the rise: League audit

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Anti-Semitism and hate increased in Canada for the second consecutive year, according to the annual audit of anti-Semitic incidents of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights.

London officials concerned Incidents up in Montreal
see page 28

The 55-page report released last week noted 267 reported incidents of anti-Semitic harassment and vandalism in 1999, representing an 11 percent increase over the 240 incidents reported in 1998.

The largest proportion of incidents, 205 acts, were categorized as harassment, including assaults and threats. Most fell into the category of hate propaganda, but there were 16 assaults, compared to two in 1998.

Toronto, with the largest Jewish population in Canada, had the greatest number of incidents (119), albeit fewer than in the previous year (123).

British Columbia also experienced a decrease in reported incidents, down to 12 from 17 in 1998. Media disapproval of anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial, in the wake of a local human rights case against former North Shore News journalist Doug Collins, may have been a contributing factor, according to the audit.

There was a "startling" 48 percent increase in anti-Semitic vandalism countrywide, with 62 reported incidents, said Harriet Kravitz-Morris, league co-chair, at a press conference last Tuesday.

The increase could reflect several violent incidents that took place in the United States, she added.

Reported incidents included verbal threats and three "particularly vicious" cemetery desecrations, Kravitz-Morris said. "Many people who called us this year feared for their safety."

Kravitz-Morris stressed the importance of reporting incidents to the appropriate authorities and community organizations to ensure that something will be done.

Estimates indicate that only about 10 percent of incidents are reported, said Lawrence Hart, president of B'nai Brith Canada. It's "painfully apparent" that the statistics represent only a fraction of actual incidents, he added.

Among the "alarming trends" last year, said Kravitz-Morris, was the growing number of incidents involving messianic Christian organizations attempting to convert Jews.

Poetry and imagination

Passover arrives in nine weeks. The deadline for the The CJN's Fourth Annual Passover Literary Supplement arrives in just 2½ weeks.

The supplement is one of our most exciting and gratifying "projects." It evokes an energetic and warm response from our readers. Each year, more and more individuals have sent us their literary offerings. We are very pleased to receive them and happier still to publish as many as we can.

The support and the promotion of Canadian Jewish literature is very important to The CJN. That is why we try, whenever possible, to feature new writing, such as that which appears in Parchment, the annual literature anthology edited by Adam Fuerstenberg, or in Dorot, the student publication.

Two collections of poetry by Canadian poets have recently crossed my desk. Each of the poets has submitted to The CJN poetry that has been published in our Passover Literary Supplement. I am therefore doubly delighted to bring these publications to the attention of our readers.

* * *

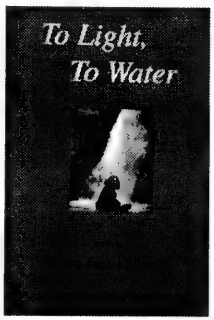
A Hamiltonian who now resides and writes in Toronto, Litovitz' writing is young, energetic and provocative.



Her poetic imagination ranges with delicate and sometimes startling insight across the mundane and profound territory of daily human existence. Whether reflecting on the pleasure of washing in a bath "with the music of Puccini" or on the urgent need of physical comfort during a "paroxysm of grief," Litovitz' observations hit the mark.

The Breath of Music, Where Words and Sound Meet (Flowerfield & Littleman, 1999) is the ninth published work of Donia Blumenfeld Clenman, a survivor of the Holocaust who came to Canada in 1948.

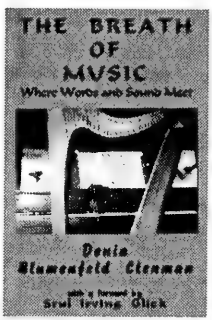
The Breath of Music, Where Words and Sound Meet is an exceptional anthology of words that have been committed to music and to song. It has the added bonus of including a forward by the renowned Canadian composer, Srul Irving Glick. We reproduce one of the poems:



Sweet Remembrance

I remember a slow train in the country
dissolving all distance.
And we, so much in love.

Stretch your hand.
Touch the darkness
with golden desire.

But I was young and foolish
and now
have a lifetime to remember.

I remember a moonlit night on the horizon
dissolving all being.
And we, so much in love.

Just a little further lover.
Still the hunger
in sweet flesh.

But we were young and bashful
and now
have a lifetime to remember.

I am no longer young.
You are no longer bashful.
Before us –
A lifetime to forget.

Forced labour survivors urged to seek benefits

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian slave or forced labour survivors of the Holocaust and their heirs should apply for benefits from Swiss bank accounts, or as beneficiaries of life insurance policies, says Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen.

Ronen, who has returned from a meeting of the World Jewish Congress in Stockholm said that the WJC took action that cleared the way for Canadians to get benefits.

Ronen, who is also the Canadian vice-president of WJC, said that many Canadians should get money from Swiss Bank accounts under a $1.25-billion settlement of claims against Swiss industry and banks.

Some progress was made establishing lists of Swiss account holders, which would help Canadians in validating their claims, Ronen said.

The bank account payouts will be supervised by a committee of retired Jewish judges.

Ronen said meetings are now under way in the United States to clarify what benefits are available to those who worked in slave or forced labor camps.

A total of 10 billion marks has been set aside to cover the costs of the negotiation process, as well as the first payments.

Ronen added that while slave labour camps were made up mainly of Jews, non-Jews were in the majority in forced labour camps.

Life insurance policies running into "billions of dollars" were taken out by European Jews who later died in the Nazi camps, Ronen said.

"The insurance restitution is different from other claims but there is no question that Canadians are involved."

The WJC's material claims conference fought demands by the insurance companies for death certificates and denials of insurance benefits because premiums were not paid, he said.

There is a possibility that lists of the policies will be issued by the companies.

"I encourage claimants to come forward and to show patience," Ronen said.

The Swiss payout will not begin until 90 days after the current U.S. meetings end, because a draft proposal and recommendations from interest groups still have to be considered.

According to the draft proposal, after the bank account payout, 50 percent of the balance of $1 billion should go to needy Holocaust survivors through social agencies, such as the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which already serve them.

Another 20 percent of the billion should go to Holocaust education and research, while 30 percent should be held for other proposals and administration.

The chief claims negotiator, Gideon Taylor, has promised to consider a request from Nate Leipciger, of Toronto, that a Canadian be added to the committee overseeing the claims

In the meantime, Ben Meed of the United States and Noah Slez of Israel are the co-chairs.

"One thing that emerged from the WJC meeting is that the Israeli government was not given the credit it deserved for adding its prestige and knowledge to the negotiations on restitution," Ronen said.

The WJC sessions also underlined that it is responsible for material restitution only, not moral restitution. This separates the WJC from other class action lawsuits, he said.

Military addresses racism issue

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Department of National Defence (DND) and the Canadian Forces (CF) are well on their way to implementing Somalia Inquiry recommendations that address the problem of racism in the military, according to a government report released last week.

DND and the CF have accepted a recommendation that they establish regular liaisons with anti-racist groups to assist officers in identifying signs of racism and involvement with hate groups. Furthermore, commanding officers are now mandated to take into account racist conduct of soldiers as a criterion before posting them overseas, the report indicates.

The final report of the Minister's Monitoring Committee on Change in the DND and the CF was released last week by Art Eggleton, the minister of national defence. It came in the wake of the Somalia Inquiry, which examined the chain of events that led to the 1993 murder of two Somali youths by Canadian soldiers while on peacekeeping duty in the east African country.

In addition to events in Somalia, evidence showed that soldiers of the Airborne Regiment sported Nazi paraphernalia in their barracks and that a member of the forces was linked to the Aryan Resistance Movement.

The changes following the Somalia Inquiry include:

• recruitment screening procedures "now require that recruits sign a statement of understanding acknowledging the CF policy of zero tolerance of discrimination and harassment;"

• in assessing which soldiers will be deployed abroad, commanding officers will take into account "antisocial behaviour such as racist conduct… or a history of harassment…"

• the Basic Officer Training Course and the Basic Recruit Training Course have been revised to include greater emphasis on cultural sensitivity." As of Sept. 15, 1999, about half of the land forces have received diversity training. In addition, DND maintains, consults and meets with diversity groups, including Canadian Police Race Relations, Assembly of First Nations and the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs.

• "Commanding officers are working with military police to monitor and deal with suspected incidents of racist conduct by CF members." In addition to officers reporting racist activity, the National Counter-Intelligence Unit, in co-operation with the National Investigation Services, will gather information on racist groups that may have a connection to military personnel.

Canadian Jewish Congress, which received standing at the Somalia Inquiry to question witnesses about racism in the military, welcomed the minister's report.

"It's evident from the lack of racist behaviour we've seen since the time of Somalia, and even before the hearing, that they have instituted their 1993 zero tolerance policy on racism," said Keith Landy, Ontario chair of Congress.

However, it's "disappointing" and "perplexing" that Congress wasn't asked to provide anti-racist education, Landy said.

Neil Sedaka to play at leukemia benfit

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A concert by popular singer and songwriter Neil Sedaka will benefit the Audey Stanleigh Research Foundation.

A Musical Night to Remember will be held at Roy Thomson Hall, April 3, at 8 p.m. It will be in memory of Mark Wolfish, 20, who died last fall from complications of a bone marrow transplant given for acute lymphocytic leukemia.

There will also be a silent art auction conducted by the Liss Gallery.

Jerome Stanleigh, who began the foundation after the death of his own son, Audey, 21, of complications from the treatment for acute myelogenous leukemia, said that the goal is to fund research in areas outside such conventional treatments as chemotherapy and bone marrow transplants.

People think that leukemia has been conquered, Stanleigh said. They don't realize that the survival rate for adults over the long term is only 30 percent, and they often die from side effects of the treatment, rather than the disease, he said. And those side effects can be horrific.

Money is also raised at the annual Hoops for Hope event, which will be held this year in June.

During his illness, Audey himself managed to raise over $100,000 to help find bone marrow transplants for others suffering from this disease, including New Jerseyite Jay Feinberg.

Ironically, the transplant for Feinberg was successful, while Audey, who received two transplants, as well as chemotherapy and radiation, died in 1996.

Surrealism without accountability

In the surreal world of Mideast despots and tyrannies, the preferred instrument of diplomacy is often murderous mayhem. For example, it is now widely accepted that Iran, through its Hezbollah surrogate, is behind the recent missile and other attacks against the IDF in south Lebanon. Seven IDF soldiers have been killed there as a result, in the last three weeks.

Along with the individual human lives whose sanctity they utterly disdain, Iran is also attempting to destroy the peace process, such as it is, between Israel and Syria.

How far is the extremist regime in Tehran willing to go to prevent even a minimal accommodation for the Jewish state in the region? The implacability of Iran's hostility to the possibility of peace between Israel and its neighbours should concern all the nations of the west as much as it does Israel.

Do not western geo-political and commercial interests coincide with the interests of the Mideast conflict's historic combatants in arriving at a peaceful coexistence? Do not the interests of all the mothers and fathers and families in the region coincide with the interests of the combatants in finally succeeding at negotiation?

Yet, no public opprobrium – from the United Nations or from capitals in Europe and North America – is directed at the government in Tehran. Why? Why should Tehran be allowed to escape accountability for orchestrating the latest cycle of violence and counter-violence?

Complicating matters as only matters can be complicated in the Middle East, is the certainty that Syria has been complicit in the stepped up Iranian campaign against the peace process. Syria's president Hafez al-Assad has allowed Iranian arms to flow to the Hezbollah through territory controlled by Syrian forces. Piqued by Israel's refusal to acquiesce to his every demand, to simply sign on the dotted line, as it were, he has decided to "punish" Israel by promoting more killing of Israeli soldiers. Thus he himself is jeopardizing the attainment of the result that he so publicly protests is his keenest desire: a peace settlement with Israel.

Yet, no public opprobrium – from the United Nations or from capitals in Europe and North America – is directed at the government in Damascus. Why? Why should the Syrian president be allowed to escape accountability for helping to set in motion the latest cycle of violence and counter-violence?

Adding to the surrealism is the rumour that Israel and Syria have reportedly agreed to resume peace negotiations in the coming weeks.

CAPTIVE IN IRAN

The government of Iran still holds the following members of the Jewish community as prisoners. Each is a universe of life and existence unto his own. And each has a name. Let us not forget them.

Games delayed by tragedy

There is a potentially misleading statement in the front page article (CJN, Feb. 3), about the bridge collapse that marred the 15th Maccabiah Games in July 1997. It states that "Four athletes...died as a result of the mishap...on their way into Ramat Gan stadium for the opening ceremonies of the Maccabiah Games. The ceremonies and the Games went on..."

I was present as a member of the Canadian team and can confirm that the opening ceremonies did not go on as planned. After the bridge collapsed, no further athletes (the vast majority of approximately 6,000 present) were allowed into the stadium. After waiting outside for two hours, we were bused back to our respective hotels. We were told that once it was known that there were fatalities, activities were stopped within the stadium. Out of respect for the deceased and injured, the Games did not go on quite as planned. Competition was delayed by one day, as we gathered for a moving prayer ceremony. Many of us wore a black ribbon pinned to one arm during competition. The closing ceremony included memorial displays and speeches in tribute to the Australians.

In summary, the ceremonies and the Games did not go on as if nothing had happened. Participants at the Games showed considerable empathy and respect for the terrible tragedy that befell our Australian brethren.

Talk to Machal veterans

It is amazing to me that we who have lived through the period from before the rebirth of Israel to the present day are still reading about a subject that was covered and recovered in worldwide media, which were and still are hungry for any news, or old rehashed news, that can cast distrust on or soil the reputation of Israel.

If you want to know the truth about Israel's wars and confirm the historical data, Norman L. Roth's letter to you Feb. 3 almost had the right idea. General Wingate lodge exists in Toronto only, and does not have exclusive rights to veterans who are Jewish. Get in touch with any of the Machal veterans. These were the veterans who had returned home from World War II, and were secretly recruited to join Israel's army to help in their War of Independence. Donate to Canadian museums

Rabbi Gunther Plaut, in his Jan. 13 article, justly praises the new Museum of Jewish Heritage in New York. He then issues a plea to readers that material related to Canadian Jewish Life be donated to the museum.

I wish to draw to readers' attention to the fact that there are several Canadian institutions that collect and make available for study and exhibit exactly the kind of material that Rabbi Plaut mentions. The largest among them, the Canadian Jewish Congress National Archives, has been collecting archives and artifacts since 1919 and is officially recognized as the repository for Jewish subject matter by the National Archives of Quebec. Other repositories are located in major Jewish centres from Vancouver to Saint John. All of these institutions would welcome donations of the type proposed by Rabbi Plaut, and many have, or are planning for, museum exhibits of their own.

Canada has long been a country where Jews have flourished both personally and communally. The Canadian Jewish community is only beginning to be studied with the attention it deserves. In order for such study to be undertaken, it is essential that relevant materials remain accessible here. It would be a pity if the Americanization of Canadian Jewry were to reach such a point as to consume our archives, the foundation blocks of our collective memory.

Slams Ontario on UN ruling

The same week Ontario is urging other countries to sign an international treaty prohibiting child labour, Ontario demonstrated its contempt for international treaties by announcing that it would not comply with the UN ruling that funding denominational schools for only one religion violates the UN human rights treaty.

Why? Education Minister Janet Ecker thinks it would be too expensive to eliminate explicit religious discrimination from Ontario's education funding system. She says the cost "would have to come from other programs or from taxpayers' pockets." She added, "There's no magic money tree."

You are right, minister. There is no magic money tree. But the parents affected are already paying full education taxes, so the money is there. If you don't have the money to educate our children, where did our money go? Religious discrimination in violation of international law is unacceptable. It is especially offensive when the purpose of maintaining the discrimination is to save a few bucks, at the expense of religious minorities who are unable, for conscientious religious reasons, to use the secular public education system.

Holocaust denial as Arab anti-Semitism

By ELIAHU SALPETER

The term "anti-Semitism" was invented by a German journalist to express his own attitudes and to define the hatred of Jews on a racial basis, as distinct from hostility toward Judaism.

The fact that the Arabs are also Semites has created several paradoxes. Hitler was on good terms with Jerusalem's mufti, Haj Amin El-Husseini, one of the Arab world's most rabid anti-Semites. Yet, today's Arab anti-Semites disingenuously claim that Arabs can never be anti-Semites, because that would amount to self-hatred.

Nonetheless, modern-day Arab anti-Semites have distanced themselves from the anti-Semitic roots in Islam and have adopted the symbols, expressions and messages of Western racist anti-Semitism.

The official Syrian newspaper, Tishrin, two weeks ago issued a particularly crude anti-Semitic barrage, claiming, for example, that the Holocaust is a legend invented to extort money and sympathy from the West. Such accusations have been made before in the Arab world - in fact, ever since the end of World War II.

Thus, Arab anti-Semites take the same position as neo-Nazis and other anti-Semites who have turned Holocaust denial into a central plank of their ideology.

Tishrin's use of this type of phrasing was not a new development. Syria continues to provide Nazi war criminals with political asylum and has always used extreme anti-Semitic wording in its verbal attacks on Israel. Damascus has used anti-Semitic vitriol to heighten tensions with Israel.

In 1998, when the Swiss bank accounts of Holocaust victims hit the headlines, Damascus Radio declared that the issue "raises many legitimate doubts concerning Nazi crematoria allegedly used to incinerate the Jews ... The Nazi high command included a large number of Jewish officers and many of them were close associates of Hitler."

The last statement echoes two traditional western "arguments" used to deny the Holocaust – that the cultivation of the "Holocaust mystique" is designed to extort additional funds from the West and to stifle any criticism of either Jews or Zionism. Holocaust denial has additional meaning for Arab anti-Semites, who claim that the "legend of the six million" led the West to establish the State of Israel – at the expense of the Palestinians.

From the Arab anti-Semite's perspective, Holocaust denial undermines the moral foundations of the Jewish state. It is thus not surprising that western Holocaust deniers, such as David Irving and France's Roger Garaudy (who has converted to Islam), are both pro-Arab and anti-Zionist.

Syrian Holocaust denial has a tactical political meaning. The Syrians are aware that Jews are especially sensitive to the issue of Holocaust denial.

Damascus' decision to raise this issue when the talks with Israel have reached an impasse shows a flagrant disregard for Jewish sensibilities and perhaps also indicates the kind of peace Syria is contemplating with Israel. It is regrettable that Israel does not respond more forcefully to such venom.

Arab publications give the impression that the leading Holocaust deniers in the Arab world are intellectuals who are also to be the chief opponents to peace with Israel. This is not a new development. In 1961, the Saud

David Irving

In November, 1941, Haj Amin El-Husseini met in Berlin with Nazi officials, above. He is pictured below with Adolf Hitler.

Arabian press called Adolf Eichmann a "martyr who bestowed a true blessing on humanity." Even the Palestinian press contains expressions of Holocaust denial.

The oppositionist, fundamentalist press in moderate Arab states consistently contains statements denying the Holocaust and has much in common with Iranian newspapers that explain that the Holocaust "legend" was concocted to inspire fear in the hearts of Jews and to force them to seek asylum in post-war Palestine.

A comprehensive study of world anti-Semitism, recently published by Tel Aviv University's Stephen Roth Institute in collaboration with the University of Nebraska, includes an article on the rethinking of the Holocaust in the Arab world.

The author, Esther Webman of the Roth and the Dayan institutes, points out that Holocaust denial has become an increasing factor in Arab anti-Semitism. She said there was immense grassroots support for Garaudy when he visited the Middle East after a Paris court fined him heavily for disseminating information which denied there was Jewish persecution.

Webman's study also notes certain indications of a change taking place in traditional Arab positions on the Holocaust. Knesset member Ahmed Tibi said Yasser Arafat's desire to visit the Holocaust museum in Washington was an expression of the Palestinian leader's desire "to share the Jewish people's historical pain" and to strengthen ties between Palestinians and Israelis.

Her study cites an article that appeared in the London-based Arab-language newspaper A-Sharq Al-Ouest, whose editor said that Holocaust-deniers "do not understand that they are concealing the persecution of Muslims by neo-Nazis in Germany and in other parts of Europe."

A former member of the Palestine Liberation Organization's executive committee, Shafiq Al-Hut, has said that the Holocaust has become an Arab problem because of its politicization, but also notes that no Arab or Palestinian could ever deny the Holocaust.

These new trends are still something of a rarity amid the flurry of two self-contradictory positions expressed by Arabs on the Holocaust. On the one hand, there is the denial, while on the other hand there is the claim that the Palestinians are being forced to pay the price for the crimes against the Jews committed by the Europeans.

The only way to remove the contradiction is to stop denying the Holocaust. The vitriolic statements that appeared in Tishrin perhaps indicate how long we may have to wait for such a development.

Opinions

A remarkable achievement

There isn't a Jewish educator anywhere who does not constantly look for the ideal teaching tool that will help to give a student not only the bare bones of knowledge, but also an incentive to look for more. I am delighted to know that such a tool has now come on the market and is available to anyone who has a computer with CD access.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Produced by Baruch Sienna, director of interactive technology at Kolel the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning in Toronto, it comes in the form of a CD for Windows and Macintosh computers.

It is, in fact, the first installment of a project entitled Gates of Torah and is an informative introduction to the Torah scroll: its ornaments, how it is written, the kinds of stories that have grown up about it through the ages and lots more – all interspersed with a multitude of pictures. Suppose you come across a word or item that you do not know or recognize – all you have to do is click on that word and automatically you will receive an explanation. Once you get the answer you can return to the main text.

You may wish to hear stories, visit a museum, or do anything that even remotely has something to do with the Torah scroll – find out how it was made, what it consists of, who the person is that wrote it, and hundreds of other matters that have to do with the synagogue and of course with Judaism of which the sefer Torah is the basic document.

This is not a toy, even though many a student may want to use it precisely because it is both serious and fun. Whoever opens the disk will surely be enticed to go on and on. And what better tool for education can there be than something that will urge a student to undertake ever greater exploration?

The disk has been four years in the making, and I was present on more than one occasion to watch how it was done. I am greatly impressed with the creator's persistence, supported by a few people who believed in investing in a venture important for education.

It is now ready, and I heartily congratulate Kolel and Baruch for their vision and persistence. If you're looking for a suitable bar/bat mitzvah gift, this certainly qualifies.

Students must respect diverse views

The groundhogs weren't the only ones getting media coverage on Feb. 2. Students all over Canada took classes off to protest the state of federal funding to post-secondary education with rallies and picket lines. It was also the day a fellow student called me a scab.

Jennifer Fox on campus in Halifax

I only had one two-hour class the day of the strike and the professors at King's decided not to have in-class assignments – so no great loss if I were to miss it. Still, I went because third-year Broadcast costs me $38.50 a class whether my tush is in a chair or not.

It wasn't a handful of radical thinkers who waved "Education is a Right" placards at passing motorists. The King's Student Union (KSU) had held a referendum to see if the students supported the Canadian Federation of Students Access 2000 campaign, as it's formally called.

Do you oppose the federal government funding cutbacks to post-secondary education?

This was the first question on the ballot. Well, duh. How many students currently in the post-secondary education system would support cutbacks to that system? Actually there were a few. Of the 299 valid ballots cast, 18 people didn't oppose cutbacks to funding.

Do you support the KSU organizing action against federal funding cutbacks, was the gist of the next question.

As representatives of the students it would be logical for the KSU to voice concerns to the government about the state of education. Only 31 of 307 voters were against the KSU taking action of some kind.

Do you support a one-day strike on Feb. 2, 2000?

After agreeing that cuts are bad in the first question and agreeing that voicing an opinion about cutbacks is a valid response, anyone who didn't support the strike was obviously contradicting themselves and better vote yes to the strike to save face.

By the way, 82 of 307 voted no. Approximately 500 King's students didn't bother to vote at all.

Missing class to support the fact that you can't afford to attend that class escapes me, no matter what the "slightly" biased ballot says.

Flooding the finance and education ministers with letters telling them "Today I just spent $106 for four hours of class" would be just as effective and you wouldn't have to borrow someone else's notes for missed lectures.

I'm sympathetic to those who worry about the increased cost of university. Every summer I get a letter telling me how much I owe for tuition and student fees. Every summer the number increases. Assuming the cost per journalism class doesn't go up, which somehow I doubt, next year's tuition alone will cost me $4,620. In first year I paid $4,195.

More funding to education would be great but striking isn't going to lower my tuition.

But is education a right, as the placards suggest? To the student who will be 22 and will graduate with a $40,000 debt, it is. But to the mother or father who loses their job and has kids to feed, maybe not. To the patients who can't get medical attention because there's a bed shortage, money for health care is a more pressing issue. To the woman who has no place to live, education isn't on her list of priorities.

If they want to strike, rally, write letters, stand up, sit in, stop payment – fine. But I'm not a scab, even if it's said in jest, because I go to the class I paid for. Students shouldn't attack others for not agreeing with their methods. The 81 of us at King's who voted no (not to mention the 500 who didn't care) write cheques to the bursar's office just the same as everyone else.

No good reason for Friday programs

Recently I was feeling overwhelmed by deadlines and decided to practise the art of procrastination. I felt I had earned the right to waste time, and that one more graduate school or fellowship application would likely cramp my typing fingers.

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

I needed time, time to lie on my bed and stare up at the blue ceiling and think. Think about what? Anything but why I want to go to your school, how your program will benefit my career goals, and what I feel I can contribute to you and your institution. Writing my name, address, phone number and date of birth in black printed letters over and over again is not an exercise one would deem to be exhausting, and yet, it has been.

So, I lay there peacefully, and I started to think about how nicely I should treat my mailman if I want him to drop good news into my mailbox between now and May. Rationally, I am aware that the mailman doesn't write the letters; he only delivers them. But my ability to demonstrate any logical reasoning has been warped by sleepless nights and too many application forms.

People who complain are typically those who are concerned about the outcome of their effort, and I realize that my complaining is premature. However, it was this down time that spawned the consideration of the following philosophical debate in my head. I bring the issue to your attention because I am interested in your input and am looking for some distraction while I await today's mail.

My friends and I organize a NCAA basketball tournament pool every March to raise money for different organizations. Over the past two years, we have raised more than $8,000 for the Montreal Children's Hospital. Every year, we attempt to expand our event to increase the number of entrants in the pool, and ultimately, to increase the amount of money we donate.

Last year, we threw a party on the night of the final game of the tournament. This year, we thought of having a party on an intermediate night of the tournament for a change. One individual on our committee suggested that the party be on the first Friday night of the tournament. He rationalized that Friday night was a good night to get people out, and that many of our entrants would still be in the position to win a prize and thus would be more likely to attend.

As a group of Jewish students, most of us reacted negatively to the proposition, afraid that we would alienate too many people – our friends, or those with whom we are involved as part of other extra-curricular activities. The idea was rejected.

Now I lay on my bed wondering. Did I find the idea offensive because I wasn't entirely comfortable attending, or did I really think throwing the party on a Friday night was an error in judgment? Was I being selfish? The same individual had made the argument that we were doing this for charity (tzedakah) and that the Montreal Children's Hospital is not a Jewish organization.

This did not sit well with me. I felt and I maintain (as do my peers) that since we are Jewish students, it is our responsibility neither to offend our brethren nor to show disrespect to our religion. The concept of tzedakah that is the foundation for this basketball charity pool event is not enough to allow us to cast a blind eye to the commandments and values that do not suit our needs at a given time.

Are we too narrow-minded in believing that everything we do should honour the mitzvot, even if the rationale is that we are doing it as a courtesy?

The answer has become clearer to me. As a member of the committee, if I feel as though I have to make a choice between observing the Sabbath (in whatever way I feel comfortable with) and attending a party I am helping to organize, then there is no decision – there is to be no party. Why should I compromise my beliefs and risk a falling out with friends and peers when the party could just as easily take place on another game night? I shouldn't and won't have to.

I picked up the telephone and called two of the committee members to discuss my brainstorms, only to find out that one was too busy with a medical school application and the other was working on his law school application.

And so, I returned to my own deadline-hungry work.

The Kirshner File

A silver lining in Joerg Haider's victory

Call Joerg Haider what you will: a telegenic populist who panders to xenophobia and racism; a charismatic Austrian nationalist who has misrepresented Nazi concentration camps, praised Nazi Germany's labour policies, and called members of the Waffen SS "decent people of good character."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

These are reprehensible views, not the values of a politician who cherishes tolerance or respects history. And yet the inclusion of Haider's Freedom Party in Austria's new coalition government may not be without a silver lining.

The Haider phenomenon, like the election of Kurt Waldheim as Austria's president in 1986, could have the beneficial effect of yet again forcing Austria to internalize its Nazi past. For Austria, as well as for Jews, this would surely be a positive development.

Until the Waldheim affair, Austria was a smug, self-satisfied country which basked in the self-serving myth that it had been a hapless victim of German Nazism. Hadn't Austria been invaded and annexed by Germany in 1938? Hadn't it thus lost its independence and ability to chart its own course?

These specious arguments were bolstered by the 1943 Moscow Declaration – signed by the United States, the Soviet Union and Britain – which described Austria as "the first victim of Hitlerite aggression." The Moscow Declaration was a document of incredible expediency, cynicism and deceit, as it completely whitewashed Austria and conveniently enabled postwar Austrian politicians to bury the past without any consequences.

In this self-forgiving spirit, Austrians lost sight of important facts: Austrians deliriously welcomed a fellow Austrian, Adolf Hitler, to Vienna in 1938, although some Austrians opposed him to the bitter end. Austrians embraced Nazi ideology, including its anti-Semitic component. They took advantage of the Aryanization decrees which stripped Jews of their wealth and property. And a rather disproportionate number of high-ranking Nazis and concentration camp administrators were of Austrian origin.

And yet, for four decades, Austria refused to accept historical responsibility for its complicity in Nazi crimes. Unlike Germany, Austria wallowed in a kind of moral amnesia. As a result, Austrian reparation payments to Holocaust survivors were minimal, school texts all but glossed over the Nazi period, and Austrians considered themselves victims rather than perpetrators. The national mood was perfectly personified by The Sound of Music, a mushy though entertaining Hollywood film which painted an egregiously inaccurate portrait of 1930s Austria.

So, aided and abetted by the great powers and a commercially successful movie, Austria traded on its image as a snow-capped, fairy-tale land of sacher torte, Viennese waltzes and Mozartian music.

Waldheim, the two-term secretary general of the United Nations, inadvertently shattered this mythical construct. On the eve of his electoral victory, a scandal of international proportions engulfed Austria. Waldheim was accused of moral negligence for having concealed his wartime record as a Wehrmacht officer in the Balkans whose unit had rounded up, among others, Jewish civilians.

Joerg Haider

The uproar emboldened the majority of Austrians to vote Waldheim into office, an event which virtually isolated Austria on the international stage, reopened old wounds and, most importantly, gradually forced Austria to acknowledge its debt to Jews and finally come to terms with an era it had so blithely swept under the rug.

In 1990, Austria signed an agreement with the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany for almost $200 million (US) in reparation payments. Challenging the dogma that Austria had been a victim of German imperialism, Chancellor Franz Vranitzky, a Social Democrat, issued a long-awaited formal apology in July 1991 for Austria's role during the Third Reich. He did so about a year before Waldheim's term expired.

In 1993, during a state visit to Israel, Vranitzky said: "We share moral responsibility because many Austrians welcomed the Anschluss (the German annexation of Austria), supported the Nazi regime and helped it to function."

On the heels of this statement, Austria promised to improve and broaden assistance to Austrian victims of the Holocaust, pledged funds for the preservation of Auschwitz and Birkenau, and issued progressive new guidelines for teaching the Holocaust in schools. And then, in 1995, Austria announced the formation of a restitution fund for Holocaust survivors.

One may wonder whether all this would have been possible without the Waldheim affair.

In the wake of the fierce controversy engendered by the Freedom Party's coalition with the People's Party, Austria's growing open-mindedness of, and receptivity to, knowledge which clarifies its place in history will probably be fortified.

Indeed, the process seems to have already begun. At the insistence of Austrian President Thomas Klestil, Haider and his People's Party partner, Wolfgang Schuessel, signed a declaration which points Austria in the right direction.

It calls "for an Austria in which xenophobia, anti-Semitism and racism have no place." It binds Austria to an acceptance of its "responsibility arising out of the ... horrendous crimes of the National Socialist regime." It refers to "the singularity of the crimes of the Holocaust."

And now a few observations about Haider, a 50-year-old lawyer who has been compared with Jean-Marie Le Pen of France and Patrick Buchanan of the United States.

Haider, who has chosen to remain in his post as governor of the southern province of Carinthia, is an opportunist rather than an ideologue. Although his parents' Nazi beliefs have rubbed off on him, he is not a neo-Nazi, nor has he ever publicly made a single anti-Semitic remark. He seems to be less of an extremist than, say, Le Pen, who has said that the gas chambers were a mere "detail." And Haider has apologized for and retracted all his objectionable comments.

His anti-immigrant statements are lamentable and play on deep-seated fears, but the Social Democratic Party and the People's Party have also favoured a far more restrictive immigration policy.

The success Haider's far-right party now enjoys can be attributed to several factors. Some of its supporters were doubtless swayed by its crass appeal to xenophobia. Others were rebelling against the political system, which has been tainted by cronyism and patronage. Still others were attracted to its economic policies of lower taxes, privatization and pension reform.

Haider and his party must be watched carefully and brought to heel if they cross red lines, but Austria is assuredly not the Fourth Reich, nor is Haider Hitler reincarnated.

Save the environment

By AVI BENLOLO

Saving the environment is an issue that should be at the forefront of the human agenda. The recent celebration of Tu b'Shvat, the New Year of the trees, is a reminder of how imperative it is for each one of us to protect the environment. After all, the protection of the environment is really about the protection of ourselves.

I am going to diverge this month from writing on my usual topic of Sephardim, in the hope of sharing this incredible personal concern and how together, perhaps incrementally, we can work to rectify it.

On Nov. 18, 1992, 1,600 world scientists from 708 countries issued a formal statement to humanity, warning us to immediately change our behaviour, or soon, life as we know it will no longer be possible. These scientists included many Nobel Prize winners.

They stated that human beings and the natural environment are on a collision course. "If not checked, many of our current practices put at a serious risk the future…and may alter the world so that it may be unable to sustain life in the manner that we know."

This warning has largely gone unanswered. In his book The Sacred Balance (1998), David Suzuki outlines many of the important facts we already suspect: The human population is skyrocketing while our capacity to produce food is declining. We are adding so many toxic materials to the air that the atmosphere itself is changing (including the weather). We are, moreover, destroying the habitat for other species.

North America's consumption patterns need to be altered. Suzuki notes that "we in the industrialized world are major predators on the planet. There are about 1.2 billion of us. But in terms of our consumptive demands, we are by far the major destructive agents on the planet. Although we're only 20 percent of the global population, we consume over 80 percent of the planet's resources."

So what can we do? The obvious danger is that we all feel the battle to regain control of the planet is too great. It's easy to suppress our concerns for the environment, because North American society is fundamentally based on the consumption of goods. We must be aware of media influence convincing us to buy things we may not really need.

Radically altering one's lifestyle may be difficult, but taking small incremental measures is possible. In the long run, this will have a beneficial effect on the environment. Some of my personal favourite measures are recycling, driving less and carpooling, eliminating the use of pesticides from your gardening routine, purchasing environmentally friendly products and buying fewer manufactured products.

Finally, in keeping with Tu b'Shvat, make an effort to plant and nurture a tree this spring.

How Syria views Golan Heights

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Earlier this month, we looked at the Golan Heights and the wide range of opinion and debate to be seen on Israel's Web sites dealing with the future of that controversial piece of land. Today a glimpse of how the conflict is seen in Syria.

Golan-Syria is run by the National Information Centre in Damascus [http://www.golan-syria.org/]. The site traces the history of the area from the third century BC through the "June 5, 1967 Aggression Occupation of Golan" to the present. The site contends that Israel has been waging an international campaign to distort the past and "integrate the Golan's history into Zionism."

The conflict is also mentioned on the official tourism Web site. The Syrian Ministry of Tourism includes the city of Quneitra in its Web site [http:/www.syriatourism.org/Destinations/quneitra.htm] although it does not really recommend that tourists visit the area. Quneitra had been under Israeli control from 1967 to 1974, but during that time it claims that Israel destroyed it "totally and systematically."

You can also read the short news reports and commentaries in the daily Syria Times [http://www.teshreen.com/web/homes.htm]. And SANA, the Syrian Arab News Agency, is an excellent resource to see how the Mideast conflict and peace talks are being reported locally [http://www.sana.org]. The Headlines section affirms President Hafez al-Assad's willingness to resume peace talks in return for a full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan. The Reports area of the site focuses on what it calls Israeli terrorism: "Zionists believe that terror acts are the only and the ideal means to accomplish their colonialist and expansionist targets to get at the innocents and opponents in the world."

One group not given a great deal of coverage during the negotiations are the Jews of Syria. According to an interesting article by Susan Sevareid of Associated Press, the Jews of Syria hope that a true piece will bolster their dwindling numbers. Since travel restrictions were lifted, their numbers have fallen from 3,900 to about 125 in one of the world's oldest Jewish communities [http:// www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/aponline/20000127/aponline042003_000.htm].

(It would be impossible to mention the plight and freedom of Syrian Jewry without recalling the story of Judy Feld Carr [http://www. cjnews.com/pastIssues/june3-99/front5.htm]. For a quarter century, the Toronto woman orchestrated a cloak-and-dagger operation to help rescue 3,000 Syrian Jews. For her efforts, Feld Carr also received a letter of thanks from the late Israeli prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, "for 23 years of hard and dangerous work, during which you devoted your life" to Syrian Jews [http://mageusa.com/ARTICLES/history.htm].)

As for the Syrian Jews now living in Israel, they say that any peace deal should include compensation from Damascus for property they were forced to leave behind [http://news2.thls.bbc.co.uk/hi/english/world/middle_east/newsid_594000/594548.stm].

An outstanding doctor

Books
Bernard Baskin

William Osler, A Life in Medicine*, by Michael Bliss (University of Toronto Press).

One of my most cherished possessions is a book titled, Hardwicke's Science – Gossip, published in 1869 by Dr. William Osler.

On Christmas day, 1868, outside his home in Dundas, Ont., Osler, 19, found minute organisms that under a microscope proved interesting. His brief article was intended for young fellow naturalists in Great Britain and elsewhere.

Osler had originally intended to follow his father into the ministry, but changed his mind and decided to become a doctor. He was educated in medicine at McGill, and was called to the University of Pennsylvania as a professor at the age of 35. Previously, he had studied in London, Berlin and Vienna.

Witty, urbane, gifted with a flair for the nuances of the English language, warm-hearted almost to a fault and devoted to the education of young physicians, he became the leading light at the Johns Hopkins faculty in Baltimore, Md., where he was appointed as physician-in-chief in 1888.

He was the greatest clinical teacher of his day, not only for his own students, but also for the countless thousands who read his Principles and Practice of Medicine, the most popular such text in America.

The magnetism of his personality and the breadth of his learning, medical and otherwise, made him the most sought-after speaker and the most famous doctor in the world.

In the summer of 1906, Osler was asked by the premier of Ontario if he would assume the presidency of the University of Toronto. His immediate reactions were negative.

"I am not fit to be president of a college. I have no executive gifts, and I am 15 years too old. All the same it is most gratifying to be remembered by one's native province."

The later part of his distinguished career was spent at Oxford University. The great tragedy of his life was the death of his son, an only child, in 1917 during World War I. His wife wrote in a letter, "I can't bear it for this angelic man who has given his whole life to humanity, now he has lost his joy and pride."

He urged upon his students "some intellectual pastime which may serve to keep you in touch with the world of art, of science, of letters."

For Osler this avocation was book collecting. His library of over 8,000 rare volumes, assiduously and lovingly collected over many years, was willed to McGill University.

In 1914, he gave a talk to the Jewish Historical Society of England, on Israel and Medicine. In it, he praised Jewish medical achievements, past and present, admiring the careers of so many of his friends and the way their community honoured the profession.

Michael Bliss, professor of history at the University of Toronto, has drawn on new sources and archival research across two continents to bring to life an astonishing personality, against the background of the development of early 20th century medicine.

Bliss writes: "He had a delightful bedside manner and inspired warm feelings of hope and confidence, but he gave individual patients very little of his time. He charged high fees, came to be chauffeured around in a flashy car, and regretted that champagne did not agree with him. Osler saw no reason why the tables of those physicians who had paid their dues with years of hard work and service should not be laden with cakes and ale. There was nothing wrong with good men expecting their worth to be recognized."

In summing up Osler's life, Bliss comments that "no one today would presume to master as much of medicine as Osler reached and grasped. Neither his historical nor his sermonizing essays, most of which were outstanding in their day, now have much appeal, though Osler will always be well represented in dictionaries of quotations and aphorisms, and he may never be surpassed as English-speaking medicine's most inspirational father-figure, mentor, and role model."

U.S. archivist in Poland

Roots & Remembrance

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Yale Reisner, the American-born director of the Ronald Lauder Foundation Genealogy Project of the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw, Poland, did a whirlwind speaking tour of Canada recently, speaking to various groups in Montreal, Toronto, London, Vancouver, Calgary and Winnipeg. His trip was sponsored by the United Israel Appeal in support of its upcoming March of the Living experience.

Reisner and family arrived in Warsaw in the mid-1990s. His wife had been hired by American philanthropist Ronald S. Lauder to establish the first Jewish school in that city in 45 years, one of 23 that the foundation has established across central and western Europe. Meanwhile, Lauder told Reisner, an archivist with a gift for languages, to go to the Jewish Historical Institute and "make yourself useful – find something to do."

"I had free access to the archives from day one," he says. "And they are remarkable archives, although not in the best condition. So we created the Lauder Foundation Genealogy Project." Its purpose was to assist people to find what they were seeking in terms of documents and other items of Jewish provenance.

Reisner quickly discovered that the demand was huge. "This was something that Mr. Lauder was surprised by. The volume was incredibly large, and I was all alone, me and my laptop."

Reisner and a small staff assist about 100 visitors a month to find evidence of their Jewish roots. An increasing number of Poles, ostensibly Gentiles, make contact because they suspect they have Jewish roots. Because some feel a stigma in dealing with a Jewish organization, the Project established a Jewish Roots hotline, which rings off the hook each Thursday evening.

Reisner has often assisted "hidden children" – born Jewish but raised as Catholics during the war. "Every week people walk in and say, 'I just found out I'm Jewish and I'd like to find out more about it, and see if there's anything left of my family.'"

One man, a general in the Polish army, told Reisner he had been born to a Jewish family in Krakow, escaped to the Soviet Union in 1939, and joined the Soviet army. After the war, he continued his military career in Poland. Fifty years later, he'd like to know what became of his family. Within minutes, Reisner found photos of the man's mother, father, aunts, uncles and cousins. "It was the first time he had seen his mother's face since 1939 – and he cried."

Reisner also tells of a Catholic priest who discovered he was a Jew, hidden as a child during the war; he made a pilgrimage to Israel and found an uncle. "This Lubavitch Chassid comes running to meet his nephew, the priest," Reisner relates. "And there's hugging and kissing, and they take him to the synagogue – I've seen the videos." The man remained a priest, and became involved in Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

Reisner also helped a younger man discover that he is Jewish. He now calls himself Binyamin and has become an observant Jew. He married a woman who also discovered her Jewish roots as an adult and they are raising a family in a Jewish home. "To me," Reisner says, "this is a genealogical miracle."

For Reisner, the trip to Toronto was like visiting an "ancestral shtetl" since his mother and grandfather were born here. Further, he has it on good authority that his great-grandfather, Joseph Weinrib, was the first traditional rabbi in the city; Weinrib arrived about 1901 to lead the Shomrei Shabbos congregation.

Write to Reisner c/o The Jewish Historical Institute, Lauder Genealogy Project, ul. Tlomackie 3/5, 00-090 Warsaw.

New effort explored for Jewish alcoholics, addicts

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews don't drink (maybe a sip of wine now and then) or do drugs. A shicker or druggie is a goy.

Nahum (not his real name) is out to help people first and foremost, but he also wants the Jewish community to end its denial of alcoholism and chemical dependency among its own.

Like an alcoholic who first must admit he needs help, the Jewish community must work to dispel the myth that there are no Jewish addicts in its midst, as well as the stigma that comes with it, Nahum feels.

Only then will the "thousands" of Jewish alcoholics and chemically dependent in this city get help.

That's why he's spearheading the arrival in Toronto of Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others (JACS), a hugely successful and well-regarded New York City-based mutual help group for Jews in recovery from booze and drugs.

About a decade ago, a group called the Jewish Recovery Network began holding meetings in Toronto synagogue basements for recovering Jewish alcoholics. But it soon fizzled.

The first tentative step toward a new effort takes place this Thursday, when a "consciousness raising effort" for rabbis, mental health practitioners and staff of Jewish Family & Child Service will be held. On Thursday night, the board of JF&CS will meet to decide whether a service like JACS is needed in Toronto, and whether a relationship with it should be forged.

If all goes ahead, JACS could set up shop here soon.

"We are aware there's a need for recovery services in a Jewish context," says JF&CS social worker Terry Kay. "There are Jews in recovery across the religious spectrum."

But there is also "a deep shame associated with [addiction]. Will Jews come?"

Nahum is betting they will. For decades, groups such as Alcoholics Anonymous (AA), Al-Anon and Narc-Anon have met in the basements of churches. Assembling a group of recovering Jews in a Jewish setting could go a long way toward tackling the issue, he feels.

He ought to know. Nahum, now in his 50s, grew up in a Jewish, alcoholic home. His father drank heavily and constantly, and his mother grew to have an unhealthy co-dependence on him. For years, she and the couple's four children endured a reign of terror that included emotional, sexual and physical abuse, and behaviour Nahum today understatedly calls "bizarre."

"My father carried a loaded pistol," he remembers, barely able to keep his emotions in check. "We often looked down the barrel of that gun. Fear was the dominant emotion in our lives.

"I couldn't trust my parents. I feared them. I couldn't talk to them. We had a number of rules: 'Don't talk. Don't trust.' But today I don't condemn them. I realize they were both sick."

He remembers the family getting "zero support" from doctors, the religious community, even friends. "Back then, it was considered a moral problem." His father was probably drunk at his bar mitzvah, Nahum remembers. He and the other kids would often have to sit in the family car for hours while their father was in a bar.

He calls alcoholism "a cunning, baffling and powerful disease." Neither he nor his siblings became alcoholics, but growing up in a co-dependent home was trauma-inducing enough.

About a decade ago, he read a book on alcoholic families, "and I cried for three days." That's when he began attending meetings of Al-Anon for co-dependent families, friends and associates of alcoholics.

Founded in 1979, JACS runs kosher retreats that to date have drawn over 6,000 Jews from all denominations. Since its inception, the group has had over 3,000 dues paying members.

It educates the Jewish public as much as it helps recovering Jews, says its executive director, Maxine Uttal. Addiction, she says, is a physical, mental and spiritual disease, one that can be successfully treated.

JACS relies on the traditional 12-step program of recovery from substance abuse, which Rabbi Abraham Twersky, the maverick U.S. rabbi and psychiatrist who runs a highly successful drug rehabilitation program near Pittsburgh, has tailored to reflect Jewish values.

There's a large spiritual component to the 12 steps, Nahum points out. God is mentioned often.

"The process is one of reconditioning," he says. "The first thing you hear is that you're not alone. I know that recovery is possible, and is available, in the Jewish community." And one of the key components in recovery – anonymity – is always respected, he stresses.

Happy Birthright Israel

Erica Baum, Samantha Barkin and Brianne Buckman are in the process of making history. The three university student chums from Toronto are among 900 Canadians participating in the groundbreaking Birthright Israel program, the largest, most ambitious Israel experience program ever.

"It's like a dream come true," says Buckman, a 20 year old York University student who was chosen from among nearly 3,000 applicants from across Canada to partake in the inaugural Birthright Israel mission. The program is itself a dream come true for many Jewish leaders, including Canadian philanthropist Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt from the United States, who are leading donors behind Birthright Israel. The unprecedented project affords young people, ages 18 –30, from all over the world, the opportunity to travel to Israel on a fully-subsidized and structured, educational trip.

Birthright Israel, which sent 5,000 young people from the United States and other countries last December, is a joint venture with worldwide Jewish communities, philanthropists, and the government of Israel. Based on the belief that Israel experiences are one of the most effective ways to strengthen the Jewish identities of young people, program administrators are eagerly awaiting to gauge its impact.

Jewish Campus Services and the Canada Israel Experience Centre, two UJA FEDERATION supported agencies, which helped to recruit and prepare participants, will be providing follow-up programming after the mission. "The goal is to tap into their excitement and channel their enthusiasm into some form of long-term community involvement," says Glennie Lindenberg, Chair of UJA FEDERATION's Jewish Continuity initiative. "For many, this trip will be a life-altering experience," adds Lindenberg. "It will bring them closer to their Jewish roots and hopefully compel them to find meaningful ways to express these feelings."

The itinerary is designed to nurture Jewish identity and encourage deeper involvement in Jewish life. In addition to visiting landmark historic sites and meeting with Israeli peers as well as dignitaries, Brianne, Erica, Samantha and 325 other Torontonians, will visit facilities supported by Canadian Jewish communities, including those in the Eilat-Eilot region, which is twinned with Toronto. Many Birthright Israel travellers will also be joining members of UJA FEDERATION's Israel 2000 mission, February 14-22.

A Year of Yiddish

Toronto's Jewish community is marking A Thousand Years of Yiddish with a year long celebration of Yiddish and Ashkenaz culture.

So far over 15 organizations have joined UJA FEDERATION's Committee for Yiddish to coordinate city-wide events which include an upcoming gala evening at the Yiddishland Café on April 2 featuring well-known Yiddish musicians and singers.

"We would like to have as many organizations as possible, including schools, synagogues and other community groups representing all ages to take part," says Rhea Shulman, Chair of the Planning Committee. "The celebration is timely because of the tremendous revival the Yiddish language and culture are enjoying in this city."

Planners are also looking for volunteers interested in organizing a Thousand Years of Yiddish Conference to be held in Toronto later this year.

For more information about events or volunteer opportunities please call (416) 635-2883 ext. 265.

FSU Aliyah Rises

The final figures for 1999 show a dramatic increase in the number of Jews leaving the former Soviet Union (FSU) for Israel.

The major motivating factors for Jews to start new lives in Israel are anti-Semitism plus political and economic turmoil throughout the FSU. The number of Jews making aliyah last year from Russia, where anti-Semitism is strong, more than doubled to nearly 30,000.

Racists use 'brainwashing' to recruit teens, says former white supremacist

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In his younger days, T.J. Leyden was a foul-mouthed, beer-drinking troublemaker who'd as soon knock you senseless as give you the time of day.

It didn't take much for him and his muscle-bound buddies to launch into a "boot party" if they thought it would promote the cause of white supremacy. His body is covered with 29 racist tatoos, many of them acquired as badges of pride – like military ribbons – for an act of violence that would bring a long-sought racial armageddon closer to reality.

Today, at age 33, his rage has subsided and even his tatoos have faded, thanks to numerous laser surgery treatments. He no longer espouses racial separation, but instead speaks publicly about the dangers of the racist movement.

His outspoken condemnation of white supremacist movements have made him a pariah among his former associates – at least those who haven't been killed or ended up in jail. Three attempts have been made on his life and he keeps the location of his home in the United States a closely guarded secret.

Last week, Leyden was in Toronto on a speaking tour that saw him address students at CHAT and members of NCSY. He also spoke to supporters of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in the corporate boardroom of O & Y Enterprises.

Leyden's message was simple, if somewhat disturbing. Racists, he said, target malleable teenagers who want more than anything in the world to fit in and be an accepted member of a group. They employ a "brainwashing" technique similar to that he experienced in the U.S. Marines, break them down and then build them up so that they adopt the values you wish them to hold. In their intense need to be accepted, teens will gladly volunteer for a boot party, he said.

White supremacists, he continued, have found allies among Hispanic extremists as well as the Nation of Islam (NOI), all of which seek racial separation. There is a "massive relationship" between white and black racists, he said.

American and Canadian racists co-operate all the time, he continued, and Canadian racists can go places Americans can't. Canadians, he pointed out, visited Libya in a bid for financial aid and channelled some of that money to the United States.

Leyden, a former member of the Hammerskin Nation, noted that in recent years, racists have shifted their attention to the Internet, which is home to 2,500 racist Web sites as well as numerous chat groups.

Leyden said he turned his life around, at age 28, after having been arrested 12 times, been shot at, stabbed and having seen several friends killed. A number of factors conspired to make him re-evaluate the direction his life was taking. At the time, his three-year-old son chastised him for showing his one-year-old son a cartoon that featured "niggers." Then, at a rally at the Aryan Nations compound in Idaho, he was told not to "talk stupid" when he asked what the racist agenda would be after they succeeded in all their goals. "Don't talk stupid," he was told, "we'll start in on hair colour next."

He realized "it doesn't matter who wins. In the end, they'll turn on themselves."

Leyden believes there are between 35,000 and 50,000 hard core racists in the United States, and not all of them skinhead brawlers. Many come from the professional classes.

Canada's racist scene is proportionately smaller, but Leyden said co-operation between the United States and Canadians racists is common. Canadian racist organizations currently suffer from a lack of leadership at the top, he added.

Today, Leyden serves as a consultant with the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre (his mother suggested he seek their help when he was decompressing from his racist associations) and his mission is to warn young people about the dangers of intolerance.

As for his boys, "I want to let my kids know there's a price to pay for your stupidity and actions."

Religious leaders share views

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The world's three major monotheistic faiths have more in common than many may believe, if an interfaith panel last week was any indication.

A rabbi, a Roman Catholic bishop and a Muslim leader took turns explaining their respective religions' central tenets, and found they were expressing many of the same ideas and philosophies.

"We are all the children of God"

The three addressed an interfaith symposium sponsored by the University of Toronto's Newman Centre Roman Catholic Mission at the end of a two-day meeting of the Canadian Christian-Jewish Consultation.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Machzikei Hadas Congregation and a leading proponent of interfaith dialogue, said all of Judaism can be condensed into one "core value:" belief in God.

He said a common misconception among Jews is contained in the Shema, the prayer which states that God is one. The Shema, Rabbi Bulka said, "does not affirm God's oneness, but his 'only-ness,' " meaning the Jewish God "is the God of everyone, no matter what religion, or in the absence of religion. We are all the children of God."

Another core value of Judaism is to treat everyone with respect and dignity, he said. Affirming the worth of others, and restoring their lost property are key. In fact, "there is nothing in Jewish legislation that does not emanate from this core view."

Reverend Marcel Gervais, the Catholic Archbishop of Ottawa, was quick to note that "our Lord, our Father, was a Jew," and that Christians, like Jews, "should all mark profoundly that God rescued us from slavery."

As well, Christians, like Jews, see laws "not just as legislation, but as example."

Christianity, Archbishop Gervais said, views society's most vulnerable members "as the touchstones of reality. The way we treat the poor and the defenseless are the measures of our lives."

Prof. Ibrahim Hayani, an economics teacher at Ryerson Polytechnic University and a leading Muslim educator, explained that the word Islam has two meanings: submission to God, and the peace that comes with that.

Islam, Judaism and Christianity, he said, all descend from the same person: Abraham. Moses, Jesus and Mohammed can all trace their lineage to the biblical patriarch, he said.

All Muslim thought and action is governed by the Koran, which promulgates four main concepts that are applicable to human behaviour: acknowledging the unity of God, pursuing justice, seeking knowledge, and acting as a "trustee" of God.

Muslims depart from Catholics in that they do not believe in the concept of original sin. Humans, Hayani said, are born innocent and become guilty only by committing bad deeds.

"God is forgiving, but people are accountable."

In an aside, Hayani said the fundamentalist Taliban, who rule Afghanistan, "cannot possibly be viewed as Islam," because of the severe restrictions they have imposed on women.

Musician got started in Ukraine

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Mark Skazinetsky has travelled to and from many places on his way to becoming associate concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

But as the Toronto Symphony Orchestra faces its first European tour since the recent strike, Skazinetsky said he is feeling somewhat uneasy about the planned stop in Vienna, Austria.

Mark Skazinetsky, associate concertmaster.

Two weeks ago, Joerg Haider's extreme right Freedom Party was asked to join Austria's coalition government. Since then, several members of the European Union have frozen diplomatic relations with Austria, and Israel has recalled its ambassador.

"My mother was in the ghetto in the Ukraine for three years during World War II," Skazinetsky said in an interview. "Going to Vienna at this time is something I feel very uncomfortable about."

Symphony violinist, soloist and conductor

Skazinetsky, who was born in Odessa, began studying the violin when he was six years old.

"Although I had other teachers," he said, "my father, who was the concertmaster of the Odessa Philharmonic Orchestra, was my unofficial teacher.

"When I was young, my father made me practise for three hours a day. Back then it felt like torture. But he told me that one day I would thank him. And he was right."

Skazinetsky's other teachers included Mark Singer and the late Benjamin Mordkovitch.

By the age of 15, Skazinetsky had won first prize in the Ukrainian competition for young talents, and performed as a soloist with the orchestra.

In 1979, with the help of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), Skazinetsky and his family made their way to Canada.

"JIAS was very helpful when we left Russia," he said. "En route, my daughter got very sick in Vienna, and JIAS provided us with financial, administrative and moral support."

JIAS helped Skazinetsky's family

A few years ago, when JIAS celebrated its 75th anniversary, Skazinetsky said he was happy to be able to donate his services to the celebration.

At that performance, which took place at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, Yefim Adler was commissioned to write Jewish Dances, a trio for violin, cello and piano.

Skazinetsky played the violin and Igor Gefter, who now plays with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, played the cello. Marina Surgan, the principal pianist with the National Ballet School, played the piano.

Since then, Skazinetsky has performed as a soloist and has conducted the symphony on several occasions.

He is also the music director and conductor of the Huronia Symphony Orchestra in Barrie, as well as a teacher at the faculty of music at the University of Toronto.

Since becoming a member of the TSO in 1980, Skazinetsky notes that he has travelled extensively with the orchestra in Europe, the Pacific Rim and the United States.

But this coming stop in Vienna leaves him troubled.

"It's as if history hasn't taught us anything," he said.

Photographer documents plight of homelessness

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As far as Nir Bareket is concerned, it doesn't really matter what tragic chain of events has led someone to a life on the street.

Whether it's drugs, booze, mental illness or just plain bad luck, no one should have to live their lives in a cardboard box, on a heating grate or in a shelter, he says.

Working in his spare time and at his own expense, he shot more than 3,000 black and white photographs. He has distilled that mass of pictures into a more manageable collection of 50 richly textured and provocative images.

The photos will be presented in Gimme Shelter, an exhibition that will run from 6 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 21 to Feb. 26 at the BCE Place Galleria, 181 Bay St. Diane Meaghan, a Seneca College professor of sociology who has studied the issue of homeless women in Toronto, will provide commentary on the photos.

The exhibit is sponsored by the United Way of Greater Toronto as part of its campaign to create greater awareness of social issues in Toronto.

"We hope Gimme Shelter will help educate people about the issue of homelessness as well as convey a message of hope by showing families and individuals who have escaped the cycle and found homes," United Way president Anne Golden said.

Despite his association with the United Way, Bareket had no idea his work would be placed on display when he first embarked on the project. A native of Israel, Bareket felt he had to do something to let people know about the tragic lives of Toronto's underclass.

"I arrived in Canada 25 years ago and I don't remember seeing [many] homeless people on the street. What I see now is 50 fold. I wanted to lend my voice to say, something has gone wrong. For me, it was a situation where I could not let it lie."

With the co-operation of Toronto shelters and with the permission of his photographic subjects, Bareket accompanied the Anishnawbe Health Toronto and the Salvation Army Street Patrol on their 4 a.m. forays on the streets of Toronto. He visited numerous shelters and "hidden places" where the homeless live.

What he saw – and photographed – is disturbing: a couple living for two years in a four-by-five doorway alcove; a father and son squeegee team; people living in a public bathroom in a park; a 17-year-old girl living in a shelter after her boyfriend kicked her out for getting pregnant; drug and alcohol addicts; a mentally ill women lying in a pool of her own urine. In short, a glimpse of those occupying society's lowest rung.

Bareket acknowledges that many have made poor life choices, "but being a drug addict or an alcoholic should not be a reason for being on the street.

"I have seen success stories of those who got off the street with just a little push. I think of it like a car in the ditch. A tow truck, with a little help, gets the car back on the road... It's far from me to say that all the people on the street are suffering angels or squeaky clean, but this can be said for much of society," he said.

Bareket is pleased the exhibit will be mounted in BCE Place, in the heart of Toronto's business community. "We wanted it to be exposed to corporate Canada in a very public place to let people know what's going on," he said.

Ultimately, his goal is to assist the United Way "to keep the pressure on" for more government funding to aid the homeless.

"No one should have to live on the street," he said.

Visit to Holocaust Museum a memorable experience

By DANIELLE CHAHINE
Special to The CJN

Students from Queen's University in Kingston recently visited the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum as the focus of a weekend trip to Washington D.C., organized by Queen's Hillel. From Jan. 27 to 30, we also enjoyed a Shabbat dinner together, and tours of the Washington monuments and the lively Georgetown area.

Comment

The museum visit lasted all of Friday, giving people the chance to absorb themselves in the exhibition. The Holocaust museum had a strong emotional impact on all of us. While some participants went through Jewish high schools in Montreal and Toronto, many had not yet been exposed to Holocaust education.

The museum offered detailed and captivating accounts of the Holocaust from a thorough historical perspective. Video screens showed countless personal survival stories. The exhibition evoked strong feelings among members of our group, and led us to reflect on the tragedy.

The goal of the trip was to expose as many students as possible to the Holocaust museum. Two years ago, Queen's Hillel organized a similar trip, and attracted about 40 students, most of whom were Hillel members. Initially, we hoped to attract a similar number on the second trip, so that we would be able to fill up one bus.

Our publicity was geared towards Jewish and non-Jewish students, and interest was overwhelming. News of the trip quickly spread to Jewish student unions on campuses across Ontario. Eventually, 74 participants from the University of Toronto, the Royal Military College, as well as a diverse group from Queen's, pretty well filled two buses.

The size and diversity of the group indicated true success, as we had reached our goal of promoting Holocaust education to students from various backgrounds.

Naturally, the trip also contained many fun aspects, including a Shabbat dinner at the International Youth Hostel where we stayed, and a nighttime visit to Georgetown, the heart of Washington student life.

Lots of free time allowed students to explore the city at their own pace. While some participants returned to the Holocaust Museum, others also took the opportunity to visit the Arlington National Cemetery in nearby Virginia, as well as the national art, history, and American history museums.

Overall, the trip proved to be a unique and memorable experience for all.

We are grateful to Hillel International – a Soref grant from Hillel International helped subsidize the trip. Thanks to the entire Queen's Hillel executive whose dedication and enthusiasm, before and during the trip, made it the success that it was.

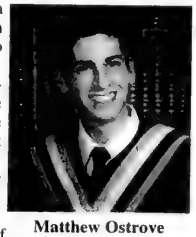
This is the second of three pre-trip interviews with Birthright Israel participants.

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Matthew Ostrove, a 19-year-old University of Manitoba film student, has a unique reason for wanting to travel to Israel.



Matthew Ostrove

He is producing a movie which will be set in Israel, but filmed in Winnipeg or Toronto and he wants to take photographs of Israel's landscape so he can recreate it in his film.

Ostrove, who owns a production company called Tempest Film, is touring Israel for 10 days as part of the Birthright Israel program, launched by Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt.

In his movie, The Pawn, the main character is of Arab origin. His parents, who are proponents of peace, are killed by terrorists. He then falls prey to the brainwashing techniques of a terrorist organization whose members want to raise him to be a suicide bomber.

The purpose of the movie is to send the message that world peace is worth fighting for, Ostrove says.

The 90-minute feature film, which Ostrove describes as a psychological thriller, is in its early stages. Director Trevor Mowchun, a University of Victoria film student, has researched the psychology of brainwashing and has read books and watched films on terrorism to understand the psyche of a terrorist.

Ostrove, who has never been to Israel before, hopes this trip will help him gain insight into the tension between Jews and Arabs in the Middle East.

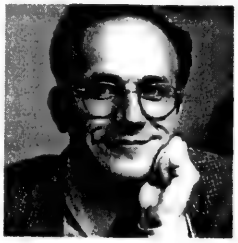
He believes the trip will also be one of personal growth.

"I think Israel will show me a piece of myself that I have never found – my true identity as a Jew."

York U to train day school teachers for the West

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — York University's innovative Jewish Teacher Education Program will be the home of a new program to provide qualified teachers for day schools in Canada's western provinces.



Alex Pomson

The project will be funded by The New York-based Covenant Foundation, which will provide a $185,000 grant. Other monies will come from the western communities themselves.

Alex Pomson, Koschitzky Professor of Jewish Education and co-ordinator of the Jewish Teacher Education Program at York University, told The CJN that The Western Canadian Coalition of Jewish Educators approached York for help to deal with the serious shortage of qualified teachers for the Jewish day schools.

A media release notes that York is "the only public university in North America that certifies teachers for both Jewish day school and the public systems concurrently."

Pomson explained that the students, most of whom are expected to come from the West, will join the Jewish Teacher Education Program at York. Like the regular students, they will spend one day a week practice-teaching at local day schools.

Their long teaching block, two weeks after first year and four after the second and third years, will be at day schools in the West.

As well, they will undertake guided and supervised field studies in the West, to learn about such matters as different approaches taken there and distinct problems faced by day-school teachers in small communities or in the Canadian West.

Pomson expects three to five students to enter the program every two years, which will produce as many as 20 new day school teachers over the first 10 years.

"Actually, it is a five-year program, consisting of one year in university, one year in Israel and three in Jewish education," Pomson said.

The faculty and students at the York program are very close, Pomson said. There is a yearly Shabbaton, and many informal events to bring them closer together. He said that he hopes that this collegiality will help the western students integrate easier.

The program will be officially launched in Vancouver on Feb. 25. The first participants are expected to start at York in September of this year.

Therapeutic mural planned for Cummer Lodge

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A sculpture of a challah, the Yiddish words shayna kinderle (beautiful child) and a Chanukah menorah will be part of a new 20-foot therapeutic mural at Cummer Lodge.

The retirement home has 391 residents, about 100 of whom are Jewish.

Thanks to a grant from the Seniors Secretariat of the Ontario Ministry of Health, the lodge will be getting the mural designed by artist Sharyn Adler Gitalis.

According to Adler Gitalis, a former public relations assistant at Leah Posluns Theatre, the mural, to be executed on a blank wall connecting the dining room and auditorium, will bring beauty and environmental awareness to the residents.

It will have tactile elements so that the blind residents will be able to enjoy it as well. Those with Alzheimer's disease will see childhood memories in it.

"I think it will be a great addition to the lodge," said administrator, Leah Walters. "It will make things much more personal. The lodge will look like a home."

Working with family members and residents, the artist wants the mural to express the lives of residents and to this end intends to include two paintings by Sybil McIntosh.

It will also include two mittens knitted by residents to illustrate how much knitting they do in the form of scarves, sweaters and toques for street kids in downtown Toronto.

Many of the Jewish residents come from Russia, Romania, and other parts of Europe, and Adler-Gitalis has interviewed them, as well as those who have lived most of their lives in North York.

The artist has been working on the mural since August of last year, but not full time. She expects to have it done by the end of March with the help of two assistants, family volunteers and residents.

Cummer Lodge is currently undergoing a renovation program which is almost complete. The residents quarters are now double their previous size. Four-bedded rooms have been eliminated in favour of semi-private and private rooms with en-suite bathrooms.

Historian helps link Russian, Canadian cities

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A prominent Canadian Jewish historian is forging a link between Winnipeg's Jewish community and the Jewish community of Vladimir, a Russian city of 300,000.

Abe Arnold, who praises the Joint Distribution Committee for its efforts to sustain and foster Jewish life and culture in Russia, is making a contribution to the same cause by promoting connections between Winnipeg's Jews and those of Vladimir. The Russian city is located about 200 kilometres east of Moscow.

Arnold and his wife, Bertha, were in Vladimir from Nov. 14 to Dec. 9 under the aegis of Canadian Executive Services Overseas (CESO) to advise the Jewish community of 1,500 on building community institutions.

CESO is a program that sends retired and semi-retired volunteers to underdeveloped countries to advise organizations and businesses in their areas of expertise.

Bertha Arnold has had five previous assignments on behalf of CESO in South and Central America advising community groups on organization and fundraising. Her husband has accompanied her on three of the trips.

Natalia Itelson, executive director of Vladimir's Jewish community's Chesed Organization, the Jewish philanthropic and community organization of Vladimir, heard about CESO, Arnold says, and asked the Canadian organization for help. The Arnolds were invited to take on the assignment.

"The Joint Distribution Committee has helped set up a network of Jewish charitable organizations throughout the cities and towns of the former Soviet Union," Arnold reports. "Natalia Itelson grew up in Vladimir and she was willing to move back to start an organization there for the Jewish community."

Vladimir, he says, is a former Russian capital city with a history that goes back more than 1,000 years; Jews have lived in there for a very long time.

In Vladimir, the Arnolds found that the JDC helps fund the distribution of food parcels – about 400 to Jewish families on Jewish holidays, as well as about 150 on a regular basis to needy families and individuals. The Vladimir Jewish community organization also feeds 20 people a day, he adds.

Itelson and her workers have moved beyond basic physical needs. They are in the process of renovating a building they bought with help from the Russian Jewish Congress and private donors, Arnold reports.

The community has also started a Sunday school which currently has 30 students and is developing a bar/bat-mitzvah program; there is also a family club, a music ensemble, and a theatre group, which has been invited to stage plays in other nearby cities.

The Arnolds provided Itelson with advice on budgeting; they also encouraged her to continue to build an archival history of the Jewish community of Vladimir, Arnold says.

"There used to be a synagogue in the city, but the Soviets closed it. The Russian government recently passed a provision allowing communities to reclaim buildings if they can prove they were used for religious purposes, he says.

"There is not a lot of interest in religion among Vladimir's Jews, though. It is more cultural. It is hard finding rabbis to come to the city anyway."

Arnold is scheduled to appear before the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg board later this month to appeal for support for Vladimir's Jewish community.

He says that he and Bertha would be willing to go back again, but preferably in the spring or summer, as central heating is in short supply in much of Russia in winter.

There is lots of buzz about the upcoming Canada-Israel Committee Parliamentary Dinner. Widely seen as a "not-to-be-missed" event on the political calendar, it's been a few years since the CIC last hosted this gala evening.

It seems the CIC is planning to produce a video that will feature a number of politicians reminiscing about their visits to Israel with the CIC.

The film will be shown during the dinner and the exposure politicians will receive in front of 1,500 Jewish leaders and political activists from across the country is worth its weight in gold.

In this politicized town, even seating assignments are analysed for their political significance. Check out who is seated with the various future Liberal leadership candidates, to determine who has the inside track on Jewish support.

And don't forget about Preston Manning. You will be able to determine how close he is to making a breakthrough within the Jewish community by looking at who is sitting next to him during the evening.

One of the dinner's biggest winners will be Jean Chrétien, who will share centre stage with Shimon Peres.

He will get a warm response – especially if he announces some major program or other instrument of growth in the Canada-Israel bilateral relationship. It is probably no coincidence that his trip to Israel will take place the week after his love-in with the crème de la crème of the pro-Israel community.

Of course, it is the CIC itself that stands to gain – or lose – the most at this event. If the political turnout is as strong as or stronger than in previous years and if the Jewish community showing is solid, then the dinner will have been well worth the effort. The political capital and the continuing influence of the CIC will have been assured for the future.

Poles' anti-Semitism discussed

By MICHAEL REGENSTREIF
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Although most contemporary Poles have never met a Jew and most are not anti-Semitic, a "mythical anti-Semitism" endures in Polish society, according to genealogist Yale Reisner.

Reisner, an American who has lived and worked in Poland for the past six years, is senior archivist for the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation Genealogy Project at the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw.

Since the fall of communism, the Lauder Foundation has worked extensively in central and eastern Europe, helping Jewish communities re-establish themselves through such things as genealogy projects and through a network of Jewish day schools and summer camps in 15 countries. Reisner's wife is the principal of Warsaw's Lauder Foundation-sponsored Jewish day school.

Reisner recently spoke about anti-Semitism in today's Poland at Congregation Beth Ora. He explained that he would rather have talked about the genealogy project, but was addressing the topic of anti-Semitism at the congregation's request. A number of people in the audience, including some Holocaust survivors, identified themselves or their parents as emigrants from Poland.

"There is a level of discourse that allows for the disparaging of Jews in ways that are now unacceptable in North America."

Reisner also said that the word Jew is used as an "all purpose insult" by many Poles. For example, a rival soccer team might be referred to as "a bunch of lousy Jews."

The far-right press in Poland, which, he added, was very distinct from the mainstream press, had even referred to such organizations as the Polish Bishops' Council and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as "Jews."

Anti-Semitic slurs are expressed casually, sometimes without intention. As an example, he mentioned an address to a Jewish group by Cardinal Lem, the primate of the Catholic Church in Poland. The cardinal began his speech by greeting the "gentleman Jew boys."

Reisner said that, as an identifiable, kippah-wearing Jew, he has personally met with a variety of responses as he goes about his daily life in Warsaw. Some people have walked circles around him, drunks have hurled insults and a skinhead actually spat on him. But, he said, he's experienced even worse treatment in New York City where he's had stones and pennies thrown at him.

More often, rather than attracting anti-Semitic responses in Poland, Reisner said his kippah attracts "respect" in the streets of Warsaw. Poles on the streets and in shops have looked to him for information about Jews and Israel. Some have comforted him when there have been reports of bad news from Israel and congratulated him on reports of good news.

He said that anti-Semitism among Poles decreases in the more educated classes and that many Polish intellectuals are "pro-Jewish."

Poland is emerging from 800 years of church-based anti-Semitism and from 60 years of anti-Semitic rule by the Nazis and communists.

Despite the anti-Semitism that still persists in Poland, Reisner said things are changing for the better there. He pointed out that in the last election, the openly anti-Semitic party received only 7,000 votes in a country of 38 million. And the Polish government "tries to make appropriate responses" to anti-Semitism, enjoys good relations with Israel and has an ambassador to the Jewish Diaspora.

The Polish government has recently established laws guaranteeing Jews the right to Sabbath observance and religious education and the restitution of communal property lost during the Holocaust and under post-war communist rule, Reisner said. And a Holocaust-denying professor in Poland has recently been sentenced to prison.

Today's Jewish community in Poland, Reisner reported, is just beginning to re-emerge. Before World War II, Jews accounted for 10 percent of Poland's population. Almost all were murdered in the Holocaust.

Then, the small remaining Jewish community was all but destroyed in a 1968 purge by the Communist government in which "20,000 to 30,000 Jews were told to leave the country."

Most who remained did not know they were Jewish or lost contact with their Judaism. Many were, or are, the children and grandchildren of children "hidden" with Catholic families to escape the Holocaust.

More and more of these Jews are coming forward, identifying themselves as Jews and seeking to reaffirm their connection to Judaism. The genealogy resources of the Lauder Foundation's project, and their schools and camps, have helped many in that effort, Reisner said.

In the question period following Reisner's talk, several people in the audience expressed hostility to the very notion of re-establishing the Jewish community in Poland. "Why would a Jew want to live in Poland?" asked one man.

"The Holocaust happened in Poland because there was so much collaboration by Poles with the Nazis," said a woman.

In a sometimes-heated exchange, Reisner responded that the Holocaust happened in Poland "because that's where the Jews were."

by Avigdor Bonchek

Rashi is "the classic commentator" on the Torah. Students of all ages can appreciate his insights, but you can't really derive maximum meaning from his comments until you know "what's bothering Rashi?" What word or phrase in the verse did Rashi find problematic... and why? Why did Rashi choose to respond in one particular way and not another?

In Avigdor Bonchek's illuminating text, What's Bothering Rashi? you'll find intriguing analyses of select Rashis on Sefer Shemos. You'll be asked to do some clever thinking of your own — and under the author's guiding hand — you'll come to an in-depth understanding of Rashi's interpretations, unique style, and choice of language.

One thing is certain: After learning What's Bothering Rashi? your appreciation of Chumash & Rashi will never be the same again!

Also featured in this text: A selection of disputes between Rashi and Ramban to compare their approaches, styles, and analysis of words in the Torah; along with an introductory chapter "Appreciating the Ramban."

Comments in League audit concern London officials

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An assertion in the recently released audit of anti-Semitic incidents, indicating that London, Ont., has become "one of the centres of organized hate activity," caused a stir when it became known last week.

London Mayor Dianne Haskett, who hadn't read the report, was shocked by the allegation.

"I felt it was most unfortunate," she told The CJN. "We feel we have been most vigilant to make sure we are not a racist community…Every group, whatever their religious or cultural background, is welcome in London."

Following a "positive and productive" conversation with Karen Mock, national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, Haskett spoke more favourably about the audit, which also highlighted efforts of the London Police Services in dealing with a "racialist gang" called the Northern Alliance.

London, which is located 200 kilometres west of Toronto, has a population of almost 350,000, including 650 Jewish families.

"People are thinking there's lots of stuff going on, which I don't think there is," Bernie Zaifman, president of the London Jewish Federation, told The CJN last week, after seeing an article in the London Free Press that highlighted the "[centre] of organized hate activity" quote.

In a press release issued jointly with Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, Zaifman commended Haskett, London City Council and London Police Services for "their diligence in ensuring that London, Ont., remains a safe, accepting and tolerant city."

Among the incidents in London was one in which business cards of the New Order, a Wisconsin-based hate group, were placed in historical books in a major London bookstore. The cards bore a swastika and the slogan "Save the White Race."

Police in London have been dealing with a fringe element, Al Gramolini, the city's chief of police, told The CJN. Although he sees it as a relatively small group, "any fringe element causes us concern," he said.

The report wasn't implying that London is an unsafe place to live, said Amelia Golden of the League. In fact, she said, the London police are "really on top of things."

The audit is intended to "alert and inform," said Mock. "There's nothing we do to sensationalize."

Anti-Semitic incidents up in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The number of anti-Semitic incidents in Montreal reported to B'nai Brith in 1999 jumped significantly, due, in large part, to a nasty dispute in Outremont over the location of a chassidic synagogue.

There were 37 incidents that came to B'nai Brith's attention, up from 20 in 1998. In addition, four incidents were reported in the rest of Quebec, where none had been recorded the year before.

None of the incidents were especially violent. Ten were acts of vandalism and 32 were described as harassment.

Last fall, tensions between some Chassidim and Céline Forget, who had taken one of the congregations to court for illegally operating a synagogue in a residential building where she lived, reached the point where many Chassidim complained they were feeling harassed and intimidated.

They said she had filed dozens of complaints – which specifically targeted Chassidim – to police and city authorities. The Chassidim said many of these complaints were trivial. In November, Forget was elected to the Outremont city council and B'nai Brith says it has been closely monitoring her activities.

The report says uncharacteristically, the chassidic community went public with its concerns and asked B'nai Brith to intervene, and that attention apparently prompted other Chassidim to report incidents of harassment.

"For the many years that [B'nai Brith] has recorded anti-Semitic incidents [since 1982], it has been extremely rare for members of the chassidic Jewish community to come forward to report incidents," the report states.

"This dialogue confirmed what had been suspected for a long time: that because these groups rarely choose to go beyond the confines of their own community to report anti-Semitism, the annual numbers reflected by B'nai Brith over the past several years were much lower than reality."

Chassidim, as "visible Jews," told B'nai Brith they frequently encountered anti-Semitic taunts and slurs, according to the report.

"For example, many claimed that it is extremely common to have coins thrown at them, or to have a passing car slow down for its passengers to hurl anti-Semitic epithets, make references to Hitler, or give the Nazi salute."

B'nai Brith thinks that the exposure the Outremont problems received also encouraged Jews elsewhere to make the organization aware of incidents they had experienced, the report says.

However, it adds that despite the 85 percent increase in anti-Semitic incidents in Quebec, the number is still relatively low in comparison to the national statistics:

There were a total of 267 anti-Semitic incidents reported to B'nai Brith in 1999, up from 240 in 1998; and although it is estimated that 26.5 percent of Canada's 370,000 Jews live in Quebec, only 16 percent of the incidents took place there.

B'nai Brith adds the caveat that, for the second consecutive year, its Quebec statistics do not include additional incidents furnished by the police, only those directly reported to the organization; the Montreal Urban Community Police are no longer singling out hate-motivated crimes from their statistics.

Some of the other incidents in Quebec included graffiti. Swastikas were found on the walls of Levitts kosher meat packing plant, at bus stops near a downtown Lubavitch centre, and on several floors of McGill University's McConnell residence where a number of Jewish students live. Swastikas were also drawn in chalk on the driveways of a few Jewish homeowners in Dollard des Ormeaux.

Hate on the rise: audit

The use by such groups of the "deceptive strategy of disguising themselves as Jews" has made Jewish communities feel more and more uncomfortable and vulnerable, she said.

Another concern is the coast-to-coast spread of white supremacist organizations, said Marvin Kurz, who co-chairs the league with Kravitz-Morris.

There has also been a recent trend involving libel suits by extreme right wingers against human rights advocates, he said, adding that the league will be following those cases closely.

The audit also highlights good news, noted Toni Silberman, regional chair of the league. She mentioned League initiatives to promote human rights for all, through education, research and community coalition building.

Barak faces dilemma over Lebanon withdrawal

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Prime Minister Ehud Barak has to make a difficult calculation.

Months ago, he vowed to withdraw Israeli troops from southern Lebanon by July – with or without an accompanying peace deal with Syria.

But now the Israeli-Syrian talks have been suspended, and Barak has to weigh whether he should wait longer and see if the negotiations will be revived – or pull the troops out even earlier than July.

From the Israeli standpoint, a withdrawal from Lebanon after reaching an agreement with Syria – one that would be accompanied by guarantees of security along Israel's northern border – would be preferable to a unilateral withdrawal.

Analysis

But waiting can prove costly, especially now that Hezbollah has become emboldened by Barak's pledge and wants to inflict heavy damages on Israeli troops. The more losses it inflicts, the more it will appear that the unilateral withdrawal is a unilateral Israeli defeat.

During the past three weeks, seven Israeli soldiers have died in Hezbollah attacks, prompting growing calls from the Israeli public to pull the troops out before July.

Joining the calls is none other than opposition leader Ariel Sharon, the architect of Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

"The posts in Lebanon today have become anachronistic, and we must get out," he said Sunday. "Situations change."

The same day, the father of the latest Israeli casualty sounded a heartfelt call for early withdrawal.

Arye Itach, a reserve colonel, who founded the infantry unit in which his son Tzachi was killed last Friday in a Hezbollah rocket attack, said Israeli soldiers in Lebanon are "cannon fodder" because the government does not allow them to operate freely.

"We must move up the timetable," Itach told Israel Radio hours before his son's funeral Sunday. "This killing is terrible."

Meanwhile, Israeli soldiers stationed in the southern Lebanon security zone have been publicly questioning the wisdom of remaining there.

Meanwhile, the U.S. State Department criticized Syria for not influencing Hezbollah to stop its attacks on Israeli troops. The "evidence is clear" that they need to exercise their influence more effectively, spokesperson James Rubin said.

Last Friday, U.S. officials convened a five-nation monitoring committee in an attempt to stem the growing violence in southern Lebanon.

But Israel walked out of the meeting on Barak's orders after Hezbollah killed another Israeli soldier hours earlier.

Meanwhile, the question does not appear whether Israel will withdraw its troops, but when.

"We are leaving. We will go out of Lebanon not later than July 2000 – period."

Kielburger visits Israel

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Stepping into the minivan filled with journalists eager to meet him, child activist Craig Kielburger is somewhat taken aback. "It was scary walking up to this van," he says with boyish charm.

Kielburger is used to dealing with the media; he has appeared on CNN, 60 Minutes, and has had his efforts covered in the New York Times, Newsweek, Maclean's, and Saturday Night. Nevertheless, he admits he didn't expect so many people would be accompanying him to Azazmah, an unrecognized village in the Negev.

Kielburger, the 17-year-old founder of Free the Children, was in Israel for his first time last week. He came for the International Human Rights Festival, at which he presented his documentary, It Takes a Child, about the start of his organization.

Flipping through the Toronto Star looking for the comics page, the then 12-year-old Kielburger stopped to read a story about a boy killed in Pakistan. Iqbal Masih, also 12, was killed for speaking out against the child labour industry, which had enslaved him from the age of four.

That article would change the world's outlook on child exploitation forever.

Kielburger was so moved by Masih's story that he began organizing other young people around the issue of child labour and abuse. He established the non-profit human rights organization, dedicated to eliminating the exploitation of children around the world, by encouraging youth to volunteer in, and create programs that relieve the plight of underprivileged children.

Kielburger's core of 12 volunteers in Canada has grown to more than 100,000 youth in 20 countries.

"The main reason I'm here, is to learn. We promote education around the world; we're hoping to empower children to help other children."

Kielburger has been to more than 30 countries championing his cause. Free the Children has built primary schools in rural areas of developing nations including Nicaragua and India.

The organization has won many human rights awards including the 1998 Freedom from Fear Medal, which Shimon Peres won in 1995.

Upon arriving at the Bedouin village – a barren site with tents and shanty houses – Kielburger was met by more press, including a number of television crews following his every move.

The Bedouin hosts led Kielburger into a kindergarten class, where 13 kids sat bundled up in their coats, scarves and hats. As an unrecognized village, there is no electricity or heat in what buildings there are. Kielburger asks the children questions about what they're learning, and what they hope to do in the future. He then visits older classes asking them the same questions.

"I expected nomadic villages," Kielburger tells the press at the school site. "But these are organized, and for no apparent reason are unrecognized."

"There's no way Israeli society can shut their eyes on 120,000 people. What does it mean that a child is unrecognized? We're trying to give them rights," says Eliezer Yaari, executive director of the New Israel Fund, whose organization sponsored Kielburger's trip to Israel.

Asked how he feels after seeing children less fortunate than he, Kielburger says "very angry and sad. I feel like I've won the lottery living in Canada.

"The reality is you can become as angry as you want to be, but can't change anything without action."

He's here to let other kids know that they can make a difference.

"Our idea is to expose young Israelis to the fact that you can do things," says Yaari, whose organization is dedicated to trying to build a society of equality, pluralism, and the rule of law.

"It's not a joke, what Kielburger's done. At 12, he took the flag and began to march with it.

He has shown that one has to act for oneself."

From the school site, Kielburger and the press group move to the tent of Ibrahim Abu Afash, a member of the village's tribe. Here Kielburger meets 15 Bedouin teens he hopes to "empower" to act.

"I don't want to promise anything to you, I've only been here a few hours," Kielburger tells the teens. "I don't want to be like a politician and make fancy promises. I don't want to pledge anything on the spot. I hope to learn more about the Bedouin community and take that back with me to Canada."

One teenager asks Kielburger to get his village running water, but Kielburger replies that because his organization is a democratic one, he can't just promise things.

If it weren't for Kielburger's presence at this village, there probably wouldn't have been so much press coverage. And Kielburger understands the power of the press. "Unrecognized cities are unrecognized because there's no press about them," he tells The Canadian Jewish News. "When young people see a report on this issue, they can act," he says. It was, after all, an article in a newspaper that caught this boy's eye.

On his week trip, Kielburger also visited children in Kalisher, a low income community in south Tel Aviv; Ramallah; and Nazareth.

Before returning to his home in Thornhill, Kielburger – who studies at an alternative school in Scarborough that allows him to take time off school without being penalized – flew to Edmonton where he spoke with teachers about changing their curriculum to include social issues.

"Young people have a lot to offer," Kielburger says. "Most people in Israel don't give kids the credit they deserve."

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VIENNA — A rabbi and three guests walked home through the streets of the city centre after a Shabbat dinner recently, when they were stopped by a man in his 60s.

"I am a Roman Catholic," he told the rabbi, who with his long beard, and black coat and hat was clearly identifiable as an Orthodox Jew. "I just wanted to tell you how important the Jewish religion is to me."

Such are the contradictions of being a Jew in Austria today, where philo-Semitism can be used as a personal and political tool to balance fears of rising right-wing extremism and the lingering legacy of Austria's Nazi past.

Earlier that day, a stony-faced President Thomas Klestil had sworn in Austria's controversial new right-wing government, despite diplomatic sanctions by the European Union, Israel and the United States.

Noisy demonstrators marched through the city for hours, protesting the entry into the governing coalition of the far-right, xenophobic Freedom Party and carrying placards that compared party leader Joerg Haider with Hitler.

There were violent clashes, and riot police used water cannons against youthful protesters.

The rise of Haider and his Freedom Party has triggered deep concern among Austria's 10,000 Jews, not just as Jews, but within the broader context of their country as a whole.

"Democracy and the mentality of civil society are underdeveloped here," said a Viennese Jewish writer just hours after the new government was sworn in.

Said businessman Robert Liska, a member of the local Jewish community board, "I don't think of it as a Jewish question at all. Jews are affected as much as are Protestants and Catholics. No one knows how it really will be. Jews and other minorities will be warned and will watch the situation."

Before the Freedom Party joined the governing coalition, the president of Austria's Jewish community, Ariel Muzikant, had been vociferous in his condemnation of Haider – to the point where Haider had threatened to sue him.

As of this week, however, the Jewish community has not taken a formal stand or issued a formal reaction to the new government.

"Officially, the community is numb," said a community leadership insider. "They are making no comments. There is a sort of silent evaluation process going on."

Austria had some 185,000 Jews in 1938 when Hitler annexed the country – with the enthusiastic support of most Austrians. Many leading Nazis, including Hitler himself, were Austrian-born.

Nearly 70,000 Austrian Jews were killed in Nazi death camps, and 70,000 more were driven out of the country.

After the war, however, the Allies referred to Austria as Hitler's first victim.

There was no real confrontation or public recognition of Austria's role in the Shoah until the late 1980s, when Austria elected Kurt Waldheim as president, despite revelations that he hid a Nazi past.

Today, most of Austria's Jews live in Vienna, and most are Holocaust survivors, displaced persons or refugees from Eastern Europe and the Middle East and their descendants.

They run the full range, from prosperous businesspeople to intellectuals, from fervently Orthodox to reform, from Austrian-born to recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Haider's party came in second in last October's elections, capturing just more than 27 percent of the vote. It was the best showing by a far-right party in Europe since the end of World War II.

Most members of the Jewish community are believed to have voted for the Social Democratic Party, the Greens or the tiny Liberal Party.

Sichrovsky serves as a Freedom Party deputy at the European Parliament and is widely viewed as having been "bought" by the party to try to polish its image.

"Haider wanted Sichrovsky to be a bridge with the Jewish community and to soften its image abroad," said a Jewish art historian. "But it backfired. He is totally ostracized by the community."

During the campaign, Haider's platform was not openly anti-Semitic, but his strident xenophobia raised fears that anti-Semitism could become a byproduct of his rhetoric, particularly as an undercurrent of anti-Semitism still persists among some sections of the Austrian public.

Anti-Semitism "can be easily aroused by discussion over art restitution, general restitution, money claims, and the like," said Marta Halpert, director of the Anti-Defamation League's office in Vienna.

Some Jews are hopeful that the current political earthquake – in all its facets – may end up having positive results, including unmasking racism and xenophobia, and fostering combative new democratic forces.

"You have two possibilities – to stay here and be active or run away," said Jewish researcher Peter Bettelheim. "I am going to try to organize a group of friends into a political human rights movement with a clear strategy."

Jews of all ages take part in the daily demonstrations held to protest Haider and the entry of his party into the governing coalition.

"We are going on the streets every day," said Joanna Nittenberg, editor of the Vienna Jewish monthly Neue Welt. "So do my friends. We joke that we are seeing more of each other these days."

TSO discusses a boycott of Viennese concerts

"If the orchestra goes, I will not play, unless someone can convince me there are very good reasons I should play," he said.

Israelievitch, who grew up in France, said he feels strongly about the issue, especially since his father's family was killed in Auschwitz, as was his maternal grandfather.

"I'm very close to making the same decision [as Israelievitch]," Skazinetsky said. "It feels very uncomfortable going to a country with a government that shares the Nazi philosophy."

Skazinetsky, a native of the Soviet Union, said his mother spent three years in a ghetto in Ukraine while his uncle was killed in the Holocaust.

"The more I thought about it, the more I felt uncomfortable."

A TSO boycott of Vienna should be seen in the context of a widespread revulsion of the new Austrian government and as part of measures taken against it. "There are demonstrations against the government in Vienna and steps against Austria are being taken across Europe," Skazinetsky said.

"My concern is on many levels," Cohen said.

"There's now a neo-Nazi coalition government in Vienna and my question is, are we in any way legitimizing this government by playing for it?"

It would be a mistake to "appease" the 27percent of Austrians who voted for the Freedom Party. "All kinds of artists have cancelled performances in Austria," Cohen said, but he added he would perform there out of a sense of loyalty if the other musicians vote to go.

Cohen, Israelievitch and Skazinetsky agreed that opposition to the concerts is not limited to Jews. "Plenty of others who don't want to go spoke up. It's a protest against this neo-Nazi politics," Cohen said.

TSO management "has been silent," Cohen said. "They've dumped it all in our laps."

Daniel Domb, principal cellist with the TSO, said he believes the orchestra should not play in Vienna.

"We represent a very multicultural city and we represent the city when we go abroad. The TSO should not go to a country that does not respect multiculturalism and is against multiculturalism," he said.

Domb, who has been with the TSO for 26 years, said he hasn't yet decided what he would do if the orchestra decides it will perform in Austria.

The musicians are hoping to hold another meeting early this week involving TSO management and the DFAIT to discuss the issue.

Prior to the weekend meeting, Israelievitch contacted Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen for his advice on how to proceed. Ronen said Congress does not want to interfere in an "internal TSO decision, [but] we would applaud a decision not to go."

Congress believes DFAIT, which has downgraded relations with Austria, should discourage a visit or at least take a neutral position. "If they encouraged them to go, I'd be very disappointed," Ronen said.

Israel/PA miss Feb. 13 deadline

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Feb. 13 was supposed to have seen the final redeployment of the second withdrawal of Israel from the West Bank, as part of a joint Israeli-Palestinian framework for a final status agreement.

Instead, it was a day of recriminations and predictions of a peace process gone awry. Palestinians accused Barak of neglecting them in order to focus on talks with Syria; Israelis say Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat asked for too much, too soon.

The framework for a final status agreement was supposed to become a path to an overall agreement. On Feb. 13, Israel was supposed to hand over 6.1 percent of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority, mostly in the Hebron area.

Some would have been in the Jenin and Tulkarm area. About 80 percent of the land handed over– 5.1 percent of the West Bank, to be precise – would have turned Area B territory into Area A lands, meaning that they would be totally under Palestinian control. The rest would have gone from Area C – meaning under full Israeli control – to full Palestinian control.

But the redeployment never took place. The Palestinians rejected the land transfer proposal because none of the land was near Jerusalem. Israel insisted that it had the authority to decide which land would be handed over and Prime Minister Ehud Barak refused to change the maps, blaming the crisis on the Palestinians, who in turn blamed the Israelis.

"Our responsibility is to try to reach arrangements by the end of this year," Barak told the cabinet. He warned that terrorist groups are interested in torpedoing the process. But he insisted that Israel is committed to it.

Women urged not to remain in abusive marriages

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

We all know, only too well, that the Jewish community is not immune to problems related to alcohol, drugs or spousal abuse.

It is unusual, however, for victims of abuse to be candid about their situation.

In Abandoned, A Jewish Wife's True Story (Mirkov Publications, Inc.), written anonymously, the author, who is Orthodox, not only talks openly about her nine-year marriage to an emotionally abusive man, but advises women that they should, under no circumstances, remain in an abusive marriage, unless positive changes are made.

Mirkov Publications, Inc. is also the publisher of Rabbi Abraham Twerski's book, The Shame Borne in Silence: Spouse Abuse in the Jewish Community. In it, he too stresses, that above all, women need not remain in an abusive marriage.

Anonymous, who labels her book a self-help manual, was married to a man who could not sever ties with his mother. He was "a very emotionally and mentally ill man, who since the cradle, was raised by an emotionally starved, ignorant, miserable, destructive, selfish woman who destroyed both her sons' marriages and instilled in them an Oedipus complex that was beyond therapy.

"[I] literally grabbed [my] two children, and ran from [my] unhealthy situation to a beautiful life of health, happiness and success."

Her message is clear: She is not advocating divorce as the sole answer to an unhappy marriage, but she wants women to know that they can succeed alone.

Especially if a woman is being physically abused, she says, "for God's sake, leave immediately…go to the nearest room or women's shelter. This is no time to worry about your reputation or about your grandmother's silver candlesticks. This is a time to save your life."

A good message, but her experience after leaving her husband was less than realistic compared to the experience of many others.

She took her children and escaped to Florida, where she immediately found a place to live in an apartment with loving landlords.

She also found a job with good pay and flexible hours, and was able to entertain often and give her children lavish birthday parties to keep them happy – all this even though she got very little money from her ex-husband.

Will life fall into place so easily for most women fleeing from an abusive husband?

She does acknowledge, however, that re-establishing oneself can be difficult, financially and emotionally. "Try not to dwell on the negativity. You will get through these issues one day at a time.

"The understanding that divorce is a shandeh comes from our European great-grandparents who lived in simpler times. That this kind of shame would be brought upon a family was unthinkable. They kept their problems in the closet."

She stresses that those days are gone. Remaining in an abusive situation, she says, endangers the lives of the mother and children. "If a woman finds herself trapped in a loveless marriage, the Torah advocates divorce."

The purpose of the book, she says, is to give women the strength of mind to leave an abusive relationship. Her dream is to establish an abuse centre – a shelter for Orthodox women and their children – for those who feel they have no where else to turn.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Why do labels simply say colour and not list the specific food colouring used in the product? Are colourings safe?

A. Canadian food manufacturers are unfortunately not required to list food colouring names. Here is a list of some common ones that you may see listed and how the Centre for Science in the Public Interest feels about their safety:

- Allura Red and Citrus Red 2 are considered to be potentially unsafe and require further testing.
- Brilliant Blue FCF, Erythrosine, Fast Green FCF, Indigotine and Sunset Yellow (mostly found in beverages and candy) are considered unsafe and avoiding them is suggested. Erythrosine can also be found in the cherries in fruit cocktail.
- Tartrazine – some people should avoid this if allergic reactions occur. It is often found in baked goods, candy and dry macaroni and cheese dinners.

Q. There seem to be many additives in foods today. Can you give some idea of the ones that are safe?

A. The following additives are the ones I am most often asked about. They are all considered safe. EDTA, a chelating agent; fumaric acid, a tartness agent; lactic acid, which controls acid; lecithin, an antioxidant and emulsifier; polysorbate 60, an emulsifier; and sodium benzoate, a preservative.

Holocaust film towers above the rest

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Train of Life, a bracing fable about the Holocaust, blends farce with tragedy.

Radu Mihaileanu's film, scheduled to open on Feb. 18 at Canada Square, succeeds where other movies of its genre have failed.

Life is Beautiful, a vastly overrated confection, and Jakob the Liar, an embarrassing dud, unintentionally made light of the Holocaust, and the results were less than felicitous.

But Train of Life, which was actually made before Life is Beautiful, towers above them all in terms of its scintillating script, its lively acting, its bouncy musical score and its sharp cinematography.

This is a clever film, in French with English subtitles, turning on a fake deportation train crammed with Jews fleeing their doomed shtetl barely ahead of the Germans. No such thing happened, or could possibly have happened, yet there is something about it which somehow rings clear and true.

In the final analysis, this improbable ghost train riding the rails of eastern Europe is a metaphor for life itself, a comedic fable of hope and inspiration in the teeth of adversity.

The humour is seamless and plausible and, best of all, it never strays beyond the bounds of good taste. Mihaileanu, an enormously inventive director, creates a mad, mythic world in which values are inverted and words are not what they seem to be.

Train of Life, set in the summer of 1941, begins as Shlomo (Lionel Abelanski), the village fool, races breathlessly into the shtetl and announces that the Nazis are coming.

Shlomo's warning touches off a panic. What to do? An intense discussion among the village elders ensues. Shlomo, who is not as crazy as he seems, proposes an outlandish solution. The Jews will simulate their own deportation. They will buy a train and pretend to be heading for a concentration camp. The real destination will be Palestine.

Some of the wise men ridicule the plan, but the rabbi (Clement Harari) overrules them. And so the Jews prepare for their unlikely journey, cooking food, baking bread, pickling cucumbers, sewing uniforms, forging documents and foraging for boxcars and a locomotive to speed them on their way to freedom.

There is only one loose end to tie up. Who will play the "Nazi" commander of the train? Mordechai, the woodcutter (Rufus), is chosen. An apt pupil, he turns out to be an eminently effective Nazi, barking orders, trading barbs and threatening reprisals in his few encounters with the real Germans.

As the film unfolds, there are several truly hilarious scenes.

The grimy locomotive driver, new to the job, frantically consults a manual as the train pulls out of the village. Antsy anti-Nazi partisans, waiting to blow it up, are bamboozled by its erratic movements.

Later, they are confounded by the sight of Jews and "German" soldiers (Jews clad in Wehrmacht uniforms) mingling easily in a field during the sabbath. And as Mordechai gets ready to confront the first German officer in his path, the thespian in him kicks in. "I guess I'm on," he says nonchalantly.

There are, of course, dark moments in Train of Life, and the darkest one occurs when the camera pans on German soldiers setting fire to the shtetl the Jews have just abandoned. This brief scene reminds a viewer that the Holocaust is not the figment of anyone's fervid imagination.

The weakest segments relate to the budding tension between the "Germans" and a handful of Communists in the group. But these scenes do not detract from the head of steam the movie builds up as it cruises toward its denouement.

Yiddish Studies: Founded in the 10th century, Oxford, England, is one of the most beautiful university towns in the world and was home to one of the largest Jewish communities in medieval England.

Today, Oxford is home to the Oxford Institute for Yiddish Studies. The only institute in Europe dedicated solely to Yiddish, the institute offers an annual Yiddish summer course.

The course involves total immersion in Yiddish language, literature and culture, and allows participants to design the program of their choice from some 20 options. The faculty is international, and is composed of many renowned experts in their respective fields.

Part of the experience of studying Yiddish at Oxford involves trips to the world-famous Bodleian Library, which houses a unique collection of old Yiddish manuscripts. Participants also visit the British Library in London, the historic Jewish East End of London, the Imperial War Museum and the world-famous Royal Shakespeare Theatre.

The summer course runs from July 10 to Aug. 4.

Sixth Annual CJN Purim Art Contest

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 16. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small or too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, February 21, 2000. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: Children will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 2000.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 2000. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

London, England full of Jewish links

Synagogues, Judaica, Jewish museums and a vibrant community

By CURT LEVIANT
Special to The CJN

LONDON — Even on board our London-bound British Airways 747, the Jewish ambience was manifest. Next to us a couple spoke Hebrew, and farther back, a boy wearing a yarmulke was studying Mishnah.

A delicious kosher meal was served by a flight attendant who gave us a terrific tip: Be sure to take the new high-speed train from Heathrow Airport to central London – only a 15-minute ride to Paddington Station, instead of the old one-hour shlep.

Before you know it, you are in the city, which is full of Jewish links: synagogues, old and new, the British Museum with its famed Jewish collection, the East End (London's equivalent to New York's Lower East Side), Jewish courses at the universities, Jewish museums, and vibrant Jewish communities in and around London.

About two-thirds of Britain's 300,000 Jews live in the capital, but Jews and London date back nearly 900 years to 1100. Even during the time when Jews had been expelled from England (1290-1656), individual Jews, such as Dr. Roderigo Lopez, a Sephardi Jew who was personal physician to Queen Elizabeth, continued to live there.

But the flowering of British Jewry began in 1656, when Rabbi Menashe ben Israel of Amsterdam successfully petitioned Oliver Cromwell to allow Jews to resettle. From this point on, Jewish life steadily expanded over the centuries.

Since we were spending a longer period in London, we stayed in different hotels, in order to get the flavour of various parts of the city. Our sojourn commenced at the elegant Sheraton Park Lane on Piccadilly, overlooking St. James Park and within walking distance of Buckingham Palace.

Although the hotel was only a block from a tube (subway) stop, a good way to see London is to walk. So we joined the London Walking Tours Jewish tour that explores the East End, which was once the Jewish section of London.

Strolling through the old business district, now peopled by newer immigrants, we saw remnants of the bustling Jewish life that ended just after World War II, when Jews began moving to the suburbs. Along Petticoat Lane and its cross streets, we saw buildings that were once free soup kitchens, Jewish schools and synagogues. And along the way, we met an old Jewish shopkeeper, the last Jewish merchant in what was once a Jewish business area.

How about a boat ride in the middle of London? Take the lovely canal tour offered by Jason's Canal Boat Trips, in Little Venice – a 45-minute ride along Regent's Canal, passing gorgeous private mansions, gaily painted houseboats, the London Zoo, and finally Camden Lock, where crafts stalls and a lively market are located.

For a different ambience, we spent our first weekend at the Hilton Langham on Portland Place, one of London's most prestigious residential areas, a few minutes away from Regent's Park. The hotel was just a few blocks away from the warm and welcoming Great Portland Street Synagogue (actually on Hallam Street), where Sabbath services were followed by a generous kiddush.

Of the synagogues in London, do not miss the 300-year-old Bevis Marks, on St. Mary Axe Street, in the heart of London's business district. Built in 1701, this great Sephardi shul is one of the glories of English architecture and one of the most beautiful synagogues in the world, modelled after the much older Spanish and Portuguese synagogue of Amsterdam.

For our last stop, we chose the Thistle Hotel at Marble Arch, which has affordable rates and is very popular with Israeli tourists. In fact, we heard more Hebrew there than English. Although the Thistle faces a quiet street, it is only one block from Oxford Street, London's most popular shopping street, with two great department stores, Selfridge's (which has a large kosher takeout section) and Marx and Spencer.

But it is in the suburbs – Golders Green, Hendon and Highgate – that the density and hubbub of Jewish residential life is found. Here are private homes with the typical English garden, with scores of synagogues, Jewish communal organizations, kosher butcher shops, Israeli fast food and pizza places, bakeries, bookstores and fine restaurants.

For a general overview of what's happening when and where in the Jewish community, there is no substitute for that venerable British institution, the weekly Jewish Chronicle. Founded in 1841, it is the oldest Jewish newspaper in the world. Here one can learn about local problems and scandals, cultural events, art shows, concerts, new books, Jewish personalities, and Jews the world over.

The easiest and quickest form of transport is the London Underground or subway. All maps list the stations with a little red circle cut by a horizontal line, and all ads for theatres, museums and other sites always give the closest underground station.

If you travel outside of London, an eight-day or 15-day Brit Rail pass will give you access to all of Great Britain at a fraction of the normal cost. These passes as well as tickets to the 15-minute Heathrow Express should be bought in advance by calling Brit Rail at 888-422-2748.

Lisa Messinger stars in Prelude To A Kiss

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As a child, actress and singer Lisa Messinger became a regular on the popular CBC children's television show Mr. Dressup.

Since this first gig, the actress has devoted her time to studying singing, dancing and acting. Her hard work has led to long list of credits doing voice-overs, and acting in television, film and theatre.

Toronto audiences can catch Messinger from Feb. 23 to March 12 on stage at the Studio Theatre of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, where she stars as Rita in the Craig Lewis play, Prelude to a Kiss.

This is her second major role for Tribal Productions this season, after a stellar performance as Renee in Norm Foster's Drinking Alone, which she will reprise on tour this spring.

As a result of her work in Drinking Alone, Tribal Productions co-artistic directors Samuel Owen and Eli Lukawitz offered Messinger the part of Rita in which she co-stars with Owen and Alan Price.

Of her role in Prelude to a Kiss, which was developed into a movie starring Meg Ryan, Messinger says, "Rita is a very insecure woman, looking for answers to life and a place to feel safe, which she finds when she meets Peter. The story turns into a magical fairy tale at their wedding, when she kisses a strange old man and they switch souls, because she sees the old man's sense of security and he sees her youth."

After graduating from North York's Claude Watson School for the Arts, Messinger spent two years as a theatre major at Concordia University in Montreal. Then in 1992, she left for the Big Apple, where she attended the Circle in the Square Theatre School and performed off-Broadway in Who Will Carry the Word, a play about the Holocaust. She was also in a number of off-off-Broadway shows, including Butterflies are Free, Loose Ends, Cabaret, The Marriage, The Food Chain, A Little Night Music and Twelfth Night.

'Theatre is my first love'

The prestigious William Morris Agency signed Messinger and kept her busy with voice-overs. In the evening, she honed her singing skills in cabarets.

"While at Circle in the Square, I found my mentor. He was my acting teacher, Alan Langdon," Messinger says. "I thought I knew everything, since I started training and performing so young. He really taught me so much, including that acting isn't all about performing; it is about being real.

"He opened my eyes and made me more excited about acting than I already was."

After six years, the thespian became homesick for Toronto and moved back in April 1998.

"I missed my family, so I decided to try working in Canada. My uncle, Jack Messinger, is a director. He was in Israel, but now he's back. His sister, my Aunt Fran, owns the Messinger Agency, so I came back and started working with her. It's nepotism, but why not?

"It is amazing. I've made more money since I've been back than in all my years in New York. Voice-overs have been my thing, from Zellers to Swiss Chalet. [And] I play Ariel Flyer on the animated CBS series The Rescue Heroes."

Messinger has also appeared in two NBC films, The Wrong Girl and Salt of the Earth, an episode of the syndicated series Highlander: The Raven, and a new CBC miniseries of Anne of Green Gables.

"Monetarily, I like film and television because it really does pay," she says. "It's a cliché, but the theatre is my first love, because you get that immediate response from the audience and it is a very intimate relationship...When you do theatre it is so much more exciting. I love applause!

"I wish theatre paid better. If I could make money doing my voice-overs during the day and then do a show at night, that would be my dream. Every job I get, I say, 'Hooray, hooray,' because this business is so up and down."

For fun, Messinger loves watching movies, reading and running, and freely admits to being addicted to the many prime-time game shows appearing on the small screen in recent months, taping them all when she's tied up at rehearsals.

For tickets to Prelude to a Kiss, call 416-870-8000. Tickets cost $20, $25 and $30.

Sportscaster a familiar voice on morning radio

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Like Rocky, filmdom's fictitious boxing champ who overcomes adversity, sportscaster Peter Gross has had his share of ups and downs.

A onetime television broadcaster with City TV, Gross experienced a dry spell in the late 1980s when his contract was not renewed. Eventually he landed on his feet at radio station 680, where he gives live sports reports on weekday mornings.

Gross has always been interested in broadcasting.

"My parents bought me a tape recorder as a child and I enjoyed playing on it. I used to do fake play-by-play of the Junior A hockey games in the1950s," Gross said.

Gross was interested in sports and showed his athleticism and strength on the wrestling mat.

"In 1967, I was the wrestling champion for the 16 and under group. I was small at 160 pounds, but fast. When I was 12 or 13, I also played a little hockey," he said.

"At the time, City had a hulking vehicle. Many times, I would drive around, going from story to story. I would also write up some sports scripts. In the spring of that year, I went out and did a story on harness racing. Later on, there was a belly flop contest we were covering.

"I came out in a dorky pinstripe suit and did my bit where I dived into the water. In the fall of 1976, I was hired full time," he said.

"I feel most confident in broadcasting horse racing.The jockeys are quiet, self-confident and none have endorsements. I enjoy going to the track and the Breeders' Cup," he said.

Among all the celebrities he has interviewed over the years, Gross lists hockey legend Gordie Howe as a favourite.

"I interviewed Howe twice. He was so friendly. He would elaborate on things and tell several detailed hockey stories. He would treat you as an equal," Gross said.

Another memorable experience for Gross was his interview with New York Yankees manager Billy Martin. Martin, who used to play infield with the Bronx Bombers, was known for his fast temper that would lead him to butt heads with owner George Steinbrenner, not to mention certain people in the media.

"I interviewed him the year of the brawl with Reggie Jackson. I had no problem with him or anyone on the team," Gross said.

In terms of the most embarrassing interview, he mentioned a time when he was asked to do an interview with Leaf winger Errol Thompson.

"I interviewed Thompson, and [later] found out the audio didn't work. I had to go back and ask him to do it over again," he said.

The first time he met Wayne Gretzky was an eye-opener, he said. In addition to his obvious skill as a hockey player, Gretzky showed he possessed a natural athleticism.

"It was in 1980-81 at a squash academy. Gretzky was going to play a best out of five tournament. He had never played in his life, but won 3-2," Gross said.

"The producer and the station manager didn't want me to be director. I went into the office, prepared to rip up their offer, until they proposed a $20,000 signing bonus," he said.

He went on to have his own sports hit on City called World According To Gross, which looked at non-professional sports. But in 1986-89, this highly energetic sports figure was no longer employed by the television media.

Like Rocky, Gross battled back and again became a fixture in broadcasting, this time on the radio, providing morning sports updates.

WE'RE NUMBER ONE: It's hard to fly into a hurricane if you're a hawk, but at Associated, it can be done. Recently, the Associated Hawks gave the Associated Hurricanes all they could handle in the championship game of the Jewish Day School Basketball League, but in the end, fell to the Hurricanes 35-33. Both Associated teams advanced to the final after dispatching teams from Netivot, Leo Baeck, USDS Bathurst and USDS Richmond Hill. In the championship game, the Hurricanes continued their mastery over the Hawks, beating them for the third time this season. The total margin of victory in all three games was only five points. The Hurricanes are seen in the photo below in action versus Netivot.

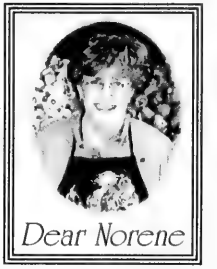
About Food



By NORENE GILLETZ

I recently received an e-mail warning that water boiled in the microwave could become superheated and explode. This is possible but highly unlikely. Here are some simple safety precautions:

- Stir liquids before microwaving and again at half-time.
- Stir from outer edges towards the centre to help equalize temperature.
- If you add instant coffee granules to water that has been heated in the microwave, it will erupt. Instead, stir a few grains of instant coffee into the liquid before microwaving.
- To help microwaved foods cook more evenly, stir once or twice during cooking. Rearrange or turn over solid foods (e.g., chicken pieces, potatoes), or rotate the dish halfway through cooking.
- Always allow liquids or foods heated in the microwave to stand for a few minutes before they're touched or consumed.
- Don't heat food in narrow-necked bottles (e.g., maple syrup). Pressure can build up and syrup can boil over. Transfer to a glass measuring cup. Allow one minute on High per cup of syrup.
- If foods have a natural covering (potatoes, squash), pierce all over with a fork before microwaving so steam can escape.
- Don't microwave food in plastic bags or supermarket disposable plastic containers. When subjected to heat, chemicals can leach out and migrate into foods.
- Quick clean-up: Squeeze a drop of detergent on a damp dishcloth, heat on High 15 seconds, wipe out microwave.
- To remove odors: Combine 1/2 cup lemon juice with 2 cups water. Microwave uncovered on High 10 minutes. Alternately, microwave 1/2 cup vinegar uncovered on High for two minutes.

CHOCOLATE PUDDING JUST FOR ME

2 tsp. cornstarch or potato starch
1/2 cup milk (skim, 1 percent or 2 percent) pinch of salt
1/4 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips

Combine all ingredients in a 2-cup Pyrex measuring cup; mix well. Microwave uncovered on high for 1 minute. Stir well. Microwave 30 to 45 seconds longer, until thick and bubbling. Stir again; chill. Makes 1 serving.

Ritché Welcomes New York Designers

The 2000 bridal season is upon us and Ritché is starting off the millennium with some exciting news. The Spring New York Market has provided the store with several new high profile designer collections. The addition of prestigious bridal lines such as The Diamond Collection, Christos and Marisa has brought an even greater variety to Toronto's most comprehensive bridal salon. The new companies feature fashion forward couturier designs using the finest of bridal fabrics.

The bridal salon features nearly one thousand gowns in a variety of styles and fabrics. These days many brides are looking for simple styling with sophistication and elegance. This is a Ritché specialty! With the addition of the New York designers the bridal department is taking on an international flavour. The 2000 collection of Pronovias dresses from Spain has arrived. Their sophisticated stylings include a collection of bridal separates that allow brides to mix and match elegant tops with several styles of skirts. Australian designed Maggie Sottero dresses are also featured in the salon. In addition to their famous corset tops and lace up backs they have many beautiful strapless gowns. Hong Kong designer Rena Koh gowns feature some of the most exquisite embroidery and detail work. The bridal department has never had a more exciting selection!

All the designer collections only enhance what is Ritché's greatest strength. The Ritché Original Designs are as exciting as ever. Surely no Canadian designer has had the experience and expertise of designer Jack Ritché. Celebrating 49 years in the bridal business he has designed thousands of wedding gowns for brides from all across North America. His greatest love is for fine fabrics and laces. Working with customers personally he sculptures the brides vision with the highest standard of workmanship. Designs are varied and exciting. The

Bridesmaids will have some exciting new choices this year as well. Ritché is pleased to introduce two new designer collections. Watters and Watters and Vera Wang Maids join the Jim Hjelm Occasions at Ritché. Bridesmaids now have a greater selection than ever.

Mother-of-the-bride and special occasion guests need to make a lasting impression too. The main floor features sophisticated suits and exciting evening wear suitable for garden parties or gala affairs. Customers often comment that they are amazed at the selection and

Brides and guests ensembles are completed with the tremendous selection of accessories, jewelry, and shoes. Kenneth Cole bridal shoes highlight a selection of over thirty styles.

With the tremendous selection and nearly fifty years as bridal experience it is easy to see why Ritché is busier and more exciting than ever.

THE ESTATES OF SUNNYBROOK

Splendor Endures at The Estates

Situated on 52 tree-filled acres not far from downtown Toronto is the elegant and graceful Estates of Sunnybrook. Comprising The Vaughan Estate and McLean House, The Estates provides the ambience and richness to make your celebration special.

Here you will find richly appointed rooms, and some of the most exquisite cuisine in our city, along with facilities to accommodate weddings with as many as 150 guests.

The grandeur is also apparent throughout the beautifully sculptured gardens, walkways and tiered patio, gardens and stone pathways overlooking the Don River ravine. This makes The Vaughan a photo opportunity for your bridal group, family and friends.

McLean House:
Stately Sophistication and Elegance

The history of McLean House dates back to 1929, when James Stanley McLean commissioned innovative Canadian architect Eric Arthur to design a unique home for the McLean family.

The result was BayView – now known as McLean House – one of Ontario's most splendid Georgian-style mansions. Set amid the natural beauty of Gordon Culham's landscaping, McLean House is as magnificent today as when it was built.

Vaughan Estate:
The Grandeur Of a Baronial Manor House

The Vaughan Estate – originally known as Donningvale – was built in 1931 in a simple Elizabethan style typical of a large stone country manor house. The exceptional renovation has retained its historic nature, providing two elegantly appointed ballrooms, each with a capacity of 150.

Planning Your Wedding?

With a history of hosting weddings dating back to the 1930s, The Estates' wedding specialists carry this tradition of excellence into the 1990s and the next millennium. Personalized service and attention to detail are the qualities that make The Estates an idyllic backdrop for a memorable wedding.

Wedding couples look to The Estates for personalized service, central location, opulent interiors, free parking and superb cuisine with kosher catering available. Another important benefit when choosing The Estates, is knowing revenues go to research at Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Sciences Centre.

For more information call The Estates of Sunnybrook at 487-3841.

Take your Wedding Video home, on DVD!

For over 13 years, DMS Video Productions has been producing Toronto's finest videos. "Our primary goal is to satisfy every customer we're privileged to work with. Working with our customers from the beginning until the end, is how we ensure their complete satisfaction," says Darren Sager, President of DMS Video.

When asked "What makes DMS Video different?", Darren responds: "We capture your event without making you feel like you're on a Hollywood set. There simply is no need to film with an ornate amount of equipment and lighting. Your guests will feel comfortable since our approach is unobtrusive from the beginning. Our advantage is the SONY DVCAM Digital system."

Digital cameras can work under much lower light levels than traditional analogue cameras, yet they still deliver a brighter, sharper and more colourful picture. When filming is complete, digital editing ensures that not only will the video maintain the original camera quality, but the tape won't suffer from degradation over time, like programs found on current VHS tapes.

"For the last 2 years, every one of our videos has been digitally mastered. This way, when our customers take home their VHS tapes, they also have the choice to take home a (future-proof) digital master tape that they know will long outlive their VHS tapes and allow them to transfer to a future digital format" says Darren.

Now, DMS Video has moved into the future of video with the introduction of DVD (Digital Video Disc). "We're very excited about this. For the first time ever, we are offering our videos on DVD. Now we can shoot, edit and deliver our videos digitally, so our customers can play their digital videos at home" says Darren.

DVD allows you to access any part of your video within seconds. The convenience of DVD means you can skip through the video just like you skip through songs on a CD. When you're done , no more rewinding, you just pop the disc out of the machine. DVD is the future of home video entertainment delivered today. With a picture quality almost 2½ times sharper than VHS, DVD delivers the quality consumers have long waited for.

"This is going to change the way event videos are viewed and delivered" says Darren. "We're just getting started with DVD and the response has already been overwhelming!"

If you are looking for a video unlike any other, DMS Video is just the studio for you. For more information you can contact DMS Video Productions at (905) 881-7677 or you can visit them on the web at www.dmsvideo.com

Odyssey: the journey begins.

There you are. A prospective groom with sweaty palms. Psyching yourself up to lay down a significant sum on something you've probably never bought before: a beautiful engagement ring for the woman you love. Standing outside the door of Odyssey Jewellers at 10909 Yonge St., Unit 55, a half block north of Elgin Mills in Richmond Hill. (Maybe a friend recommended Odyssey – word's getting around.)

Then you go in. First, you notice the look of the store – elegant, but unpretentious. Then you notice that you're greeted, but not overwhelmed. "I've seen this a million times," reports Ed Hostick, the genial proprietor of Odyssey Jewellery. "A customer comes in, they're a little nervous – the last thing they want is a salesperson all over them."

The day we visited Odyssey, Ed was discussing the design of an engagement ring with a customer. "We often get clients who want a unique piece," says Ed. "We love the challenge of custom design. That is, if you don't see something you like in stock." With a chuckle, he gestures to showcases full of the latest designs from New York, LA and Europe.

So what if you're not a young groom? "My father, Milton, and I have taken care of three generations of the same family: fathers, mothers, husbands, wives, sons and daughters, grandkids – tennis bracelets for anniversaries, watches for graduation. And Valentine's is coming up," again, Ed smiles. "People come to us for beautiful jewellery. We make them feel comfortable. So they come back. Of course, if you're a groom, we hope we only see you once."

She's one in a million. With our wide selection, the ring will be too.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 17 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 7 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 8, 2000 at Adath Israel Synagogue, 37 Southbourne Ave. (Bathurst & Wilson). It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:30 p.m. This year we are happy to welcome back Ines DiSanto of Chez Moi who will be presenting her 2000 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

Haider meets mystery group

Picketers protest the inclusion of Joerg Haider's Freedom Party in the new Austrian government, at a rally held Sunday outside the Austrian Consulate in Toronto. The rally was organized by B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadian Zionist Federation and the Zionist Youth Movements of Canada. In a fiery speech, Rabbi Gunther Plaut, inset, likened the right-wing party to an infectious disease that must be isolated in its early stages "so that it cannot spread its deadly poison." [Frances Kraft photos]

By JANICE ARNOLD and PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporters

Dogged by public protests, rescission of an invitation to visit an Orthodox Jewish enclave near Montreal and a frigid reception by the Canadian government, Joerg Haider, the leader of Austria's Freedom Party, wound up a mysterious two-day visit to Canada last week.

But during his visit, Haider met secretly with members of the Montreal Jewish community to discuss the issue of Austrian compensation to Jewish victims of the Holocaust. Montreal lawyer Brahm Campbell said he helped arrange the meeting, but he declined to identify the participants. He sloughed off criticism of the meeting from "the mainstream Jewish organizations," saying he consulted a rabbi before carrying out their request.

"The rabbi told me that in the Mishnah it says that we must dialogue, but we must be knowledgeable. Know thine enemy."

The meeting was harshly criticized by Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen. "I think the meeting has absolutely no significance," he said. "These are individuals who decided to meet with Mr. Haider. I can't imagine what they are thinking in meeting him. It's a stupid move in my view." Ronen said Haider will use the meeting to soften his image and paint himself as a middle of the road politician.

The Montreal Jews who met Haider do not have a personal self-interest but had the meeting "for the good of the Jewish community," Campbell said. "Some members (of the community) felt…it's better to talk. My understanding is that [Haider] has promised to encourage Austria to face its past and settle the situation financially and otherwise in terms of reparations."

Campbell, who is Jewish, said "Haider seems to be saying the right things. We're going to see if he does the right things…Within the next nine months to one year, I want to see things put on the rails to resolve these issues. If not, he's not sincere…We have to keep our antennae up."

Campbell asked Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler if he would meet Haider – a request Cotler turned down. Campbell said he made the request on behalf of unnamed Montreal Jews who find Haider's views reprehensible, but nevertheless believe "a line should be opened."

Vatican, PLO sign pact

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — The Vatican and the Palestine Liberation Organization, in a clear message to Israel, have signed a landmark agreement that says any unilateral decisions on Jerusalem would be "morally and legally unacceptable."

The agreement is perhaps the most significant development in PLO-Vatican relations since official ties were established in 1994. It paves the way for full diplomatic ties.

A day after the agreement was signed, the Israeli Foreign Ministry summoned a papal envoy to protest the references to Jerusalem in the agreement.

Israel accused the Vatican of interfering in peace talks with the Palestinians, but Msgr. Petro Sambi said Israel had misinterpreted the agreement.

"There is no reference to the political situation of Jerusalem" and the document only makes "reference to the religious aspect of Jerusalem," Sambi said.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Board Responds

LANGLEY, B.C. — The Langley School Board says it "regrets" an incident last month in which a boy was subjected to anti-Semitic name-calling on a school trip. In a letter to the boy's father, Michael Asner of White Rock, the board said it will continue to be vigilant, and will respond quickly and decisively when incidents like this occur. The board said it will review its policy, but in the meantime, it stated it believes that all those associated with the school district "should have the opportunity to work, learn, conduct business and otherwise associate in an environment which is free from all forms of harassment."

Snoonit Program

TORONTO — More than 40 Jewish high school students from Toronto will participate this summer in Snoonit, an immersion program at Ulpan Akiva in Netanya. Participants will experience total immersion in Israeli culture and society by touring the country, and in meetings with soldiers, public figures and Israeli high school students. The program runs July 4 to 31. Scholarships and subsidies are available until Feb. 28. For details, call 416-398-6931.

Ve'ahavta Appeal

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, has put out appeals for ice-skates, sleeping bags and blankets for the homeless. Ve'ahavta is working with Project Warmth, which collects and distributes sleeping bags and blankets to over 60 agencies. For information on how to donate, call Avrum Rosensweig at 416-964-7698.

ISRAEL

Civil Weddings

JERUSALEM — Israel's interior minister said his ministry will recognize civil marriages performed in foreign consulates based in Israel. Natan Sharansky's decision could provide a new method of tying the knot for couples with foreign passports, and whom the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate refuses to wed. Until now, these couples have had to wed abroad in order to have their marriages registered by Israeli authorities.

Support for Violence

JERUSALEM — Support among Palestinians for attacks against Israel increased to 43 percent in January from 36 percent a month earlier, according to a poll released by the Centre for Palestine Research and Studies. The poll, which had a three percent margin of error, also showed that Palestinian trust in the government of Ehud Barak dropped to 16 percent from 18 percent during the same period.

Free Trade Deal

JERUSALEM — Mexico and Israel have reached a deal on free trade. Mexico will get tariff-free access to the Israeli market for such items as cars, trucks, buses, steel and coffee. In exchange, Israel will be able to export duty-free to Mexico items including agricultural and high-tech medical equipment, and kosher instant coffee.

Looted Artwork

NEW YORK — The Nazis looted 600,000 works of art during Adolf Hitler's 12 years in power, according to a U.S. expert. Jonathan Petropoulose, research director on art for the Presidential Commission on Holocaust Assets in the United States, estimated that 100,000 objects came from western Europe and 300,000 from eastern Europe and parts of the Soviet Union. Some 200,000 works came from Germany itself, Petropoulose told the House Banking Committee.

Denmark Re-evaluates

COPENHAGEN — Denmark's prime minister said his government should review the country's actions during World War II in light of recent reports indicating the country voluntarily handed over at least 132 Jews to Germany between 1940 and 1944. The reports say Danish officials later tried to alter documents to make it look as if they had acted under German orders.

Rescuer Dies

NEW YORK — Maria Paasche, who helped Jews escape from Nazi Germany, died last week at the age of 90. In the 1930s, Paasche transported Jews to Prague before that city came under Nazi occupation.

Condom Case Lost

MIAMI — A jury in Florida has ruled against an Orthodox Jew who sued a drug store chain that fired him after he refused to sell condoms on religious grounds. The jury found that the Eckerd Corp. could not reasonably accommodate Hillel Hellinger without hurting customer service.

Cuba 'Improves'

HAVANA — Religious tolerance in Cuba has greatly improved in the past six years, says an American rabbi who led an interfaith delegation to the country. Rabbi Arthur Schneier, president of the Appeal of Conscience Foundation, organized a three-day mission this month to strengthen ties between the religious communities of Cuba and the United States.

Jews Urged to Pursue Insurance Claims

WASHINGTON — After nearly two years of work, the international commission seeking to settle unpaid Holocaust-era insurance claims launched a global effort last week to reach out to Jews who may have claims against European insurance companies.

Lawrence Eagleburger, the former U.S. secretary of state who chairs the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims, said people who believe their relatives bought life, education or dowry insurance policies between 1920 and 1945, but never received the proceeds, are eligible to file a claim.

Claimants can file an application even if they do not know the name of the company with which the policy was held.

Individuals can obtain a claims form by writing to the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims at P.O. Box 1163, Wall Street Station, New York, N.Y. 10268 USA; visiting the Web site at www.icheic.org; or calling 1-800-957-3203. All claims must be filed by Feb. 1, 2002, and are promised to be resolved within two years of filing.

Two teens charged in stabbing incident at CHAT

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto students, aged 15 and 17, have been charged with aggravated assault, after a youth from another school was stabbed during an altercation in the school parking lot last Saturday night.

The accused students, who are brothers, can not be named because of the provisions of the Young Offenders Act. They were to appear in Metro North Court on Monday, as The CJN went to press.

The incident happened during a CHAT school dance. Detective Donald Wilson of 32 Division said that a group of boys from York Region drove up to the parking lot and "met up with" some CHAT youngsters.

Sergeant Lino Muraratto of 32 Division said the CHAT students had been inside the school and were taking a break outside.

The visiting boy, Muraratto said, was stabbed in the lower abdomen in "some kind of argument that escalated."

The 15-year-old victim was kept overnight at the Sunnybrook campus of Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre. His injury, a four-inch deep cut, did not penetrate any vital organs, said Muraratto. "He was extremely lucky."

CHAT, which has 1,100 students, is located at 200 Wilmington Ave., south of Finch Avenue, between Bathurst and Dufferin streets.

An obviously shaken Paul Shaviv, CHAT headmaster, told The CJN that "this kind of thing has never happened before. CHAT is a safe and secure place."

Dances are held once or twice a year, Shaviv said. Admission is only by a CHAT photo identification card. "The dance was fully supervised by staff, and there were two off-duty police there as well."

While the students attending the dance left the building "in a responsible way," they were very upset, Shaviv said. He added that he is arranging discussions between the students and members of the guidance department, as well as an evening program for parents.

CHAT has a "zero tolerance policy" towards violence, said Shaviv. However, no decision about the students who were charged has been taken so far.

"Remember, they have just been charged – not convicted."

The attack surprised the police as much as it surprised the community, said Muraratto. "We haven't had any problems at that school."

The Jewish community of Toronto is very concerned, said Alan Sandler, president of UJA Federation. "I have asked that we accelerate the introduction of a new neighbourhood youth program in the Bathurst corridor that will address some of the challenges that families and youth are facing."

A three-jewelled treasure

There is no doubt that the subject that dominated the policy agenda of Jewish life in North America throughout the last decade of the last century was "Jewish continuity."

The tripwire for the explosion in concern over "continuity" among communal leaders was the release of an American Jewish demographic study at the beginning of the decade that found more than half of all marriages among Jews in the United States were interfaith marriages. Lately, there has been some debate over the accuracy of the figures of that study, though the debate really centres on whether the findings were merely bad or very bad. (An updated census is expected soon.)

For many community leaders, the findings in the 1991 study were like an awakening from a nightmare. At first, dazed and disoriented, they wondered out loud in genuine worry and anguish how things could have slipped so far.

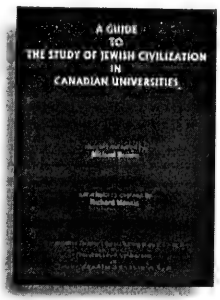
After awhile, calmer and more collected, they mobilized their best minds and their most philanthropic hearts to devise a multi-tiered strategy aimed, primarily, at pre-empting further drift by our youngsters away from their religion and, to the extent possible, retrieving what may have been lost.

The philosophic bedrock underpinning the strategy is enhanced Jewish education, formal and informal, at every level, in whatever setting, for every age category.

Even though the demographics of the Jewish community are different in Canada than they are in the United States, the principles of the strategy apply as vigorously here as they do there. Enhancing Jewish education, in both substance and opportunity – in all its myriad possibilities and manifestations – is the only meaningful communal and individual response to the erosion in Jewish life, Jewish identity, Jewish affiliation and, alas most starkly, in Jewish numbers.

With this thought in mind, it was with particular delight that I recently received across my desk, a copy of A Guide to the Study of Jewish Civilization in Canadian Universities. A joint publication of the International Centre for University Teaching of Jewish Civilization of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, the book is a small, three-jewelled treasure.

The centerpiece of the book, the first of the jewels, the key reason for its publication, is an inventory of programs and courses in Jewish studies in universities across Canada, updated to 1998.



In terms of "enhanced Jewish education," as the underpinning of Jewish continuity, the relatively recent availability of Jewish studies at the university level is an incalculably important development.

The second jewel of the book is a concise, punchy introductory essay by Michael Brown, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, the compiler and editor of the volume, in which he describes "the unique [Canadian] characteristics that form the social, political and educational context" of Jewish studies in Canada.

The third gem of the booklet is the summary essay by Richard Menkis of the University of British Columbia. Menkis writes about the changes in Canada from the early 1950s that eventually led to the establishment of diverse Jewish studies programs across the country.

Menkis is especially effective in capturing the turbulent, student-led initiatives for curriculum changes in the late 1960s and early 1970s. One reference from the archives is particularly poignant. It is a statement by a young Jewish student activist, Jeffrey Stutz, pleading in 1970 with the administration of the University of Toronto to enshrine Jewish studies in the teaching program.

His reasoning was succinct, persuasive and so very resonant with the needs, not only of his own generation, but of every generation of young Jews.

"Since the establishment of the State of Israel there has been a gradual re-awakening of Jewish consciousness in North America, especially among Jewish youth. This involves awareness of our place in the tradition, and excitement with the tasks of building the Jewish community, here and in Israel. To live with [Jewish] consciousness requires familiarity with our culture: language, history, religion, folkways and contemporary social studies. Jewish studies were needed to bring these elements of Jewish life to students." (Our emphasis)

This small publication is a useful resource for university-eligible people who wish to take part in the "task of building the Jewish community."

Schools reduce tolerance for youth crimes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite public fears, a youth crime wave is not sweeping the land, says the legal counsel for the Toronto district school board.

Violence occurs in less than 40 percent of all crimes committed by youth, and the number of violent crimes has remained steady, Eric Roher said at a recent lecture at Holy Blossom Temple.

"However, there has been a massive rush of level one assaults – those in which no weapons were used, and no one was injured," he said.

Schools also have a lower tolerance towards violence. Administrators are reporting more incidents to the police, and there has been an increased propensity for police to lay charges, he said. "Any time the police are called, they will lay charges, if they have reasonable grounds."

Violence does not necessarily involve any type of physical contact. "In a school context, violence has been defined as anything that jeopardizes the climate for an effective learning and working environment. It can include abusive language, disruptive or aggressive behaviour in the classroom, assaults, the carrying and use of weapons, and emotional and verbal abuse."

Gangs are quickly acquiring the reputation for being the perpetrators of violence in schools, he said. "There are more than 180 teen gangs across the city, and at least 30 of them carry firearms.

Bullying often goes unreported

"Surprisingly, girls account for about 25 percent of all arrests. In the past 10 years, the rate of female young offenders – those between the ages of 12 and 17 – have increased 179 percent. At least five of the gangs are strictly female."

Roher said that educators and parents need to be aware of warning signs that indicate a youth may have joined a gang.

"They often adopt a defiant manner, and have little or no respect for their teachers. They may suddenly have a whole new group of friends and adopt gang clothing, their grades may drop, and they may have unexplained money or expensive items.

"Gang members are usually those who don't fit in with the other students. They are often outcasts who are looking [for some place to belong], and they get a sense of identity by joining a gang."

Many students are afraid to report gang-related violence, but disruptive or aggressive behaviour must be addressed with progressive discipline, he said.

Bullying often goes unreported, said Roher. "The goal of a bully is to humiliate or injure someone who is weaker [or different], and the victim does not usually report it because of a fear of reprisal or retaliation.

"Bullied children often feign illness, have low self-esteem, and may stay away from washrooms. They need help because they cannot respond to threats or abuse themselves. Educators must respond to bullying of any type."

Principals must make quick decisions about when to call the police, said Roher. "If they have reasonable grounds to believe that criminal behaviour is going on, then the police should be called. It is always better to err on the side of calling the police. They can decide whether to lay charges."

Prevention is the key to all violent activity, he said. "Our approach has been to use education, training and conflict resolution. We must get students in early grades to learn ways to deal with issues.

"If we integrate programs into the school early, it can lead to the development of a lifetime of using resolution skills."

Violence in the schools is more than a school issue, said Roher. "It is a societal issue, and every part of the team – parents, teachers and police – have to be involved."

TSO concertmaster goes to Vienna, reluctantly

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jacques Israelievitch, concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO), announced last week he will join the orchestra on its upcoming tour of Europe – albeit reluctantly – and perform at three concerts in Vienna.

"I feel sick to my stomach, to tell you the truth," he said. "However I will try to focus on the music."

Other TSO musicians who had questioned the Viennese tour dates announced that they too would perform.

Members of the orchestra had met to discuss the planned performances in Vienna in the wake of the election of Joerg Haider's anti-immigrant Freedom Party. Haider has praised Nazi employment policies and called members of the SS decent people. Inclusion of the Freedom Party in the Austrian coalition government prompted demonstrations across Europe, diplomatic snubs and cancellations of other cultural events scheduled for Austria.

Israelievitch's decision was a key factor in giving other musicians a green light to participate in the controversial Vienna concert dates. The fact that his father's family was killed in Auschwitz, as was his maternal grandfather, lent musicians' concerns about the venue greater emotional resonance.

Israelievitch said he felt intense pressure to acquiesce to the concert tour. Numerous musicians had called him to say they would follow his lead in deciding whether or not to go on the tour. "The pressure came mostly from colleagues. I felt the weight of their desires," he said.

"There are certain demands in the realm of artistic excellence that go counter to personal desires... My heart isn't in it, but what made it possible for me to go was that the musical director [Jukka-Pekka Saraste] will write a strong statement focusing on racism and explaining how hard it was for us to go to Vienna. We are there to help the cause of the people who are pro-democracy and against fascism."

Saraste's statement will be placed in the concert program. In addition, the orchestra will perform a meditation by Leonard Bernstein.

"I am going only out of solidarity with my colleagues," Israelievitch said. "After much soul searching, I thought that the organization agreed to make a statement and not play as if it was business as usual. It still turns my stomach and if it were up to me, we would not be going. But I'm one of the musicians. I'm not the boss."

Richard Cohen, who plays the French horn, said he too would perform in Vienna. "I personally think for the organization that it's a mistake to go. I think that in the long term, my gut feeling is that even though we'll play the piece by Bernstein, from what I know of Nazism, it's hopelessly naive to think it'll stop their ideology." Cohen said "the message of the [Bernstein] piece is freedom, freedom of thought and expression. It says we're Canadians coming from a land of tolerance and freedom and we expect that from Austria too."

Mark Skazinetsky, associate concertmaster, told The CJN "my personal decision is to go and play with my colleagues. I support them in that, if the statement [by Saraste] is made."

JIAS changes its national structure

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) has changed its national structure.

JIAS has decreased staffing in its national office; delivery of its services will now be split between JIAS' Montreal and Toronto offices.

JIAS' Montreal office will provide services to people living east of Toronto, while the Toronto office will serve those living west of Toronto.

Jack Kugelmass, the executive director of JIAS' Toronto office, will also act part time as executive director of the national office, a position that used to be full time.

These changes will not affect JIAS' clients, said Kugelmass."It is an administrative restructuring.

Malcolm Weinstein, vice president of planning and allocations for UIA Federations Canada, JIAS' funding body, says there were some redundancies within JIAS.

"It was clear that some of the responsibilities of [national] executive director could more efficiently be delivered by local JIAS [offices]," he said.

UIA proposed changes to JIAS' national structure back in June.

But discussion of reshaping the national organization "had been going on well before June, maybe a year before that – it was not a surprise," said Sheldon Maerov, associate executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada.

JIAS has been operating under an amended budget since Feb. 1.

In accordance with this budget, a portion of the money which was allocated for salaries in the national office will now go towards improving the quality of training for JIAS-affiliated social workers across the country, Kugelmass said.

He stressed that this reallocation of funds is not a budget cut. "It is a restructuring to take into account a changed workload."

Toronto lawyer 'privileged' to donate bone marrow

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mark Mincer didn't know exactly what he was getting into when he was tested as a potential bone marrow donor. Now that he's become an actual donor, the 40-year-old Toronto lawyer says he would do it again.

In October 1994, Mincer attended a bone marrow drive on behalf of New Jersey native Jay Feinberg, simply because "there was someone out there who needed help. It was easy."

Mark Mincer

Feinberg, now 31, received his transplant from a Chicago resident in 1995 and now devotes his time to the Gift of Life Foundation (www.hla-match.org), a Florida-based Jewish bone marrow registry initially established to help find a donor for him.

Since 1991 it has recruited approximately 85,000 donors, and has been successful in matching probably dozens of donors and recipients, according to Arlene Feinberg, Jay's mother.

Mincer's resolve to help was strengthened when he learned a few months ago he could be a match for a child with leukemia. As the father of two "beautiful, healthy, wonderful" daughters – Laura, 12, and Alyssa, 8 – Mincer was determined nothing would stop him from donating marrow, provided further testing confirmed the match.

The odds of finding an unrelated donor are 1 in 20,000 to 1 in 750,000 or more, according to Canadian Blood Services (CBS), which runs Canada's bone marrow donor registry, one of almost four dozen worldwide. Jews are underrepresented in the donor pool, partly due to the Holocaust, according to the Gift of Life Foundation.

"It's like looking for a needle in a haystack," said a CBS representative, explaining that six antigens, three from each parent, must match. Donors must be between 17 and 59, and in good health.

So far this year, nine matches were made in Toronto. In 1998,"a very good year," there were 30.

Once Mincer signed final consent papers – after extensive consultation with CBS – the recipient was prepared for the transplant, a process involving six to eight sessions of full-body radiation and chemotherapy to lessen the chance of rejection.

Mincer doesn't know much about the recipient, because of confidentiality regulations. The two may correspond through the registry, but all letters are vetted to ensure anonymity, said Mincer.

To prepare for the marrow extraction, Mincer did his best to stay healthy, avoiding all medication and forgoing downhill skiing to reduce risk.

He also wrote a note to Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, whom he knew through family. He asked that the child be included in the congregation's prayers and enclosed a donation for the synagogue. He was assured by the rabbi that he too would be in their prayers.

Although Mincer describes himself as "not particularly religious," he surprised himself by telling his worried mother, "I have to have faith that God will see me through it."

A woman who works with him at the law firm of Goodman and Carr.organized a prayer group at her church, with different prayers focused on individual aspects of the transplant.

Mincer's surgery was scheduled at Princess Margaret Hospital (PMH) where he received "red carpet treatment" during his overnight stay. Both CBS and PMH staff were "phenomenal – so nice, so supportive, so encouraging," he said.

Following the surgery, during which marrow was aspirated from his hip bones and tailbone under general anesthetic, the marrow was sent on its way immediately.

Mincer was back at his commercial real estate practice within days, having attended a bat mitzvah over the intervening weekend. "I didn't do the horah," he quipped.

Two things surprised him about the procedure: the minimal physical discomfort and how good he felt, emotionally, having helped someone.

"I feel privileged to have been picked."

CLARIFICATION

In the article, "Attack on two seniors not hate motivated," (CJN, Feb. 10), reference was made to two attacks that took place last year, one outside a synagogue on Viewmount Avenue, and one in the parking garage of a nearby apartment building. Only the parking garage attack, not the one outside the synagogue, was connected to a bad business transaction.

Unwelcome politics from the Vatican

Last week, in one of the storied chambers at the Vatican, amid the clicking and flashing of cameras and the whirring of videocams, Pope John Paul II and Yasser Arafat signed an agreement whose ostensible purpose is to enshrine administrative understandings regarding Catholic holy sites within the territory governed by the Palestinian Authority. This, of course, was a perfectly appropriate and legitimate subject of business for the two men.

But the two leaders obviously had more on their minds and on their agenda than mutual relations and the administration of holy sites inside the Palestinian Authority. For, within the text of the agreement was a reference aimed directly and with pointed hostility at Israel. "Any unilateral decisions [regarding the status of Jerusalem] are morally and legally unacceptable."

When the declaration was made public, Israel reacted immediately with anger and indignation. And rightly so. It issued a statement expressing "its great displeasure" with the declaration. The following day, it summoned the papal nuncio in Israel to the offices of the Foreign Ministry to convey its categorical rejection of the reference to Jerusalem in the Vatican – PLO document.

Last week's declaration was merely the latest intrusion by the Vatican into the highly charged political situation surrounding the negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. Its timing could not have been worse, given the current stalemate in peace negotiations and its proximity to the planned visit by the Pope to Israel next month. It was offensive, echoing last year's public pronouncement by the Vatican that its preferred status for Jerusalem was as an international city. It is also potentially very dangerous, strewing even more obstacles along the already cluttered path toward the attainment of an accommodation on the one issue that rises above all partisan politics for Jews in Israel and throughout the world.

More than two decades ago, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Chaim Herzog, spoke the following words to a mostly hostile world from the rostrum of the General Assembly. It is important to repeat them. They touch the very heart of the matter.

"Israel offers no excuse for its presence in Jerusalem; it owes no apologies. Israel is there as a right – a right which has been hallowed by the Bible, a right which has been sanctified by history, by sacrifice, by prayer, by yearning, a right which has been strengthened and vindicated by virtue of the creation of the only liberal administration [in Jerusalem] in 2,000 years."

Just as the government of Israel did last week, we too must voice our rejection of the Vatican's unwelcome politics.

Winnipeg chavurah still active

Your article on modern Orthodoxy by Martin Lockshin (Jan. 13), detailed many enlightening changes occurring in Israel within the modern Orthodox community, one of which was the more active participation of women in the synagogue.

Lockshin writes that "such institutional frameworks hardly exist in Canada." Perhaps not in Toronto, but in Winnipeg, our Orthodox synagogue, the Chavurat Tefilah, since its inception 25 years ago, has had women dancing with the Torah on Simchat Torah, two women as presidents, women giving the d'var Torah, women saying the Kaddish aloud, all under the sanction of our then rabbi, Rabbi Moshe Stern (Winnipeg's, not Toronto's).

Unfortunately many of our members now live in Toronto and our numbers have dramatically decreased (as Winnipeg's Jewish population has), but our shul still carries on with these "modern Orthodox" practices. Yes, women's participation does enhance the Orthodox services and hopefully more Orthodox synagogues will try these "innovations."

Peace process requires co-operation

The unprecedented peace process negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority has become outrageously one-sided toward Palestinians. It pressures and punishes the state of Israel with insurmountable deathly risks from her Arab neighbours.

After 50 years of aggravated hate, confrontation and suspicions, the Israelis wholeheartedly aspire to reconciliation, but the Arab media still carry out venomous denunciation and vengeful curses for the destruction of Israel.They implicitly inflame and encourage extreme violence against the Israeli population.

A lasting peace in the Middle East will not emerge until there is complete co-operation for mutual national accommodation.

Ontario's stand begs credibility

I confess that I am at a loss to understand the "Robin Hood" mentality of Janet Ecker, whereby she justifies not supporting education funding, the job for which she is getting paid. She has been so bold as to set up "us and them" by telling the public that it will have to take away from the public system if it is "forced" to support religious schools. How rude! Suppose we all register our kids for public school? Who will she take the money from? I even feel foolish responding to her comment, thereby suggesting that it in any way makes sense.

As the education minister, Ms. Ecker, it is time for you to govern in accordance with the wishes of the people. You now have an opportunity to right a 100-year-old wrong. It is time to support the children of our province, those who will make, and whose parents have made, meaningful and substantive contributions to society and to your party. It is too easy to take the easy way out. You are teaching children the wrong lessons and making yourself and this government look foolish.

Wants positive stories on haredim

I am saddened and disappointed in what I perceive on occasion as anti-religious sentiment that occurs; specifically, I find on occasion that The Canadian Jewish News is anti-haredi.

I feel it would be helpful if the Jewish community would be more educated as to what Jews are. The CJN should be more objective and paint haredi Jews in a much more positive light.

Quebec Jews need Clarity Act

Where is the backbone of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q)? (CJN, Feb. 3). Did it not learn anything from its humiliating manipulation by the Parti Québécois with "Matzahgate" four years ago, that we Jews must never cower in fear, or worse still, pander to separatists?

The Clarity Act is the best piece of legislation to help secure the position of federalist Canadians living in Quebec in the last 30 years. It is positively revolting that CJC-Q, and by extension CJC-national, would not take a public position to support this valuable federalist initiative for fear of antagonizing separatists. Did 20th-century Jewish history not teach us that appeasement is a recipe for disaster? The elitists at CJC-Q must stop the back-room style politicking and better serve the entire community.

Truth, honesty and clarity are always in season. Shame on CJC-Q for displaying cowardice when our community needs leadership!

Joseph Trumpeldor: A hero for all seasons

By GIL TROY

Growing up as a bookish kid in New York City in the 1970s, I was often afraid. I donned my Yankees baseball cap to prove that I was a normal all-American boy, but my nerdy glasses betrayed me. I was an equal opportunity scaredy cat: the tough Italian and Irish Catholic kids terrified me as much as the tough black kids.

My wimpiness disturbed my parents. True, they were partly responsible, having imparted a love of books, a respect for authority, a goody-two-shoes disdain for fisticuffs. But at the same time, they did not want to raise a Galut Jew, a passive, fearful Diaspora Yid.

My father was particularly distressed. He, after all, was a Betari, a proud Revisionist Zionist, a follower of the fiery Ze'ev Jabotinsky. As a teenager in the 1940s, my father had helped smuggle machine-gun parts in matzah boxes from New York to Palestine.

Intellectual and ideologue that he was – part of the problem of course – he did not teach me boxing or karate. Instead, he raised me on a steady diet of Zionist heroes, on tales of fighting pioneers who built the Jewish state. My brothers and I learned about the Polish-born Menachem Begin, when most Americans shunned him as a terrorist – before he became prime minister and the Camp David peacemaker.

We learned about the Hungarian-born Dov Gruner, a British army veteran turned Irgun freedom fighter, whom the British hanged in 1947. And, most important of all, we learned about the Russian-born Joseph Trumpeldor – the martyr of Tel Hai.

* * *

The image is defining, inspiring, heart-breaking, breath-taking. A one-armed immigrant – a decorated Czarist war hero – defending his old-new homeland of Palestine. Fatally wounded, with his dying breaths, the warrior gasps, "Tov lamoot be'ad artzeinu," "It is good to die for our homeland."

March 1 will mark the 80th anniversary of Joseph Trumpeldor's valiant death at Tel Hai – the Hill of Life – in the Galilee. In those eight decades, Trumpeldor's ancient, wild, backward wasteland has blossomed into a modern, booming, high-tech, nation state. Trumpeldor's final words of patriotic selflessness inspired generations of Zionists, especially Revisionists.

Alas, this 80th anniversary comes at an awkward time. The state this hero helped found is at an ideological crossroad – physically and economically stronger than ever before, but morally and spiritually more confused. And Trumpeldor's legend itself is under attack. Some historians allege that the very words that electrified so many for so long were contrived.

The story of Joseph Trumpeldor, the man and the legend, encapsulates the broader saga of Israel and Zionism, the state and its founding movement. Trumpeldor's life is a case study of how the Zionist idea turned a man of the exile into a new man, a man finally at home. Trumpeldor's death illustrates the high price the Jewish people paid to fulfil the Zionist dream, to establish a modern state in our homeland. And Trumpeldor's self-sacrifice sets a standard of altruism so desperately lacking in most modern Jews, either in Israel or abroad.

Born in Pyatigorsk, Russia in 1880, Trumpeldor was the son of a cantonist, a Jew conscripted as a child to serve in the Czar's army. Twenty-five years of servitude deprived Trumpeldor's father of a rich Jewish background – but he remembered his heritage and raised his children with what we would call ethnic pride.

Russia in the late 1890s pulsated with all kinds of ideological movements. Young Russian Jews like Trumpeldor championed secular and Jewish causes. The nascent Zionist movement appealed to Trumpeldor. Having had little religious training, he welcomed its rebellion against tradition; and he had suffered enough anti-Semitism to share the Zionist's dream of returning to a homeland where Jews could live normal lives.

Zionism wanted to make a mensch out of the Jew, to transform the Galut Jew from a timid spectre into a brave new man. Zionists cherished the example of the heroic Maccabees – not the martyrs of Masada. They wanted to revolutionize Jewish life and make Jews strong, proud, free, less cerebral, and more practical and activist.

When Trumpeldor was drafted into the Russian army in 1902, his Zionism helped motivate him to serve, not flee. He would show that Jews were not cowards. Trumpeldor set a proud example – fighting valiantly in the Russo-Japanese War. The cost, however, was steep. He lost his left arm in battle and was imprisoned by the Japanese.

When he finally left the army and entered law school, 2nd Lieut. Trumpeldor was one of the few Jews ever commissioned in the Czar's army, and one of Russia's four most decorated soldiers.

While studying law in St. Petersburg and plunging into Zionist politics, Trumpeldor deepened his commitment to agrarian collectivism. He believed that Jews had to return to the land, as well as to their homeland. He also believed that working together on communal settlements was good for everyone, Jew and non-Jew alike.

During World War I, Trumpeldor teamed up with a charismatic firebrand named Vladimir (Ze'ev) Jabotinsky, who was equally devoted to Jewish self-respect and self-defence. Together, they established the Zion Mule Corps, a Jewish auxiliary to the British army. Trumpeldor's heroism with the corps at the Battle of Gallipoli helped Jabotinsky upgrade this Jewish supply squad into the battle-ready Jewish Legion.

After the war, Trumpeldor helped form Jewish self-defence organizations amid the chaos in Russia. He worked to unify and train members of Hechalutz (pioneer) movement, as well as to unify the two workers' parties in Palestine under one single non-partisan trade union. Shortly after his death, the founding of the Histadrut, the General Federation of Labour fulfilled this dream.

By October 1919, Trumpeldor was in Palestine defending the Upper Galilee. The three settlements under his command – Metula, Kefar Giladi, and Tel Hai – were vulnerable. Each obstacle, no matter how formidable, elicited the same response from Trumpeldor. Deploying his minimal Hebrew vocabulary to maximum effect he would say, again and again: "ayn davar" – literally "it's no matter." We would say: "no sweat."

Young Joseph Trumpeldor

On that fateful day, March 1, 1920, when five of his men were killed defending Tel Hai, Trumpeldor could have said, as well as he could: "Never mind, it is worthwhile to die for the country." Another Zionist thinker, J.H. Brenner, cleaned it up – some now claim made it up – into its current form: "It is good to die for our country."

Three years after Trumpeldor's tragic death, his friend Jabotinsky named his new Revisionist Zionist youth movement after the martyr: Betar, for Brit Trumpeldor, Trumpeldor's covenant. Over the decades, Trumpeldor came to represent the best of Revisionist Zionism – a hard-headed, self-sacrificing commitment to Jewish self-defence in the Diaspora and in Israel, an insouciant bravery in the face of daunting challenges – Ayn davar! It's no sweat! – a purifying zeal for discipline and dignity.

Remarkably, in a fledgling country that early on demonstrated a demented genius for factionalism and discord, Trumpeldor could serve as an icon of the left as well as the right. He could – and did serve – as a patron saint of the kibbutz movement, of the union movement, and of the commitment to cultivating and defending the land. Trumpeldor was the ultimate chalutz or pioneer, the new Jewish hero: anxious to till the soil and make the desert bloom, ready to bear arms and defend the homeland when necessary.

Trumpeldor, a man for all seasons – a soldier, lawyer, fighter, thinker – could serve as a role model for modern Jews throughout the world. To those who lived outside of Israel, his heroism and his patriotism disproved all the canards about the cowardly, disloyal Jew – he not only lost his arm serving the land of his birth, he intended to return to Russia until he enlisted in the defence of Tel Hai.

And yet, at the end of the day, this secular, cosmopolitan, Russian patriot knew he was a Jew – and was willing to give his life for our collective homeland.

This is an age of cynicism and historical revisionism, of anti-heroes and "new historians" who turn Zionists into imperialists, who convert the Jewish people's liberators into the Arabs' oppressors. Yet, successful societies need heroes; they need larger than life characters who embody abstract ideals, who realize and sanctify the nation's cherished values.

Historians have a dual obligation. We must, of course, ferret out the truth, sifting the evidence and determining just what Trumpeldor did and did not say. But historians also safeguard the stories of the past: The chronicles of a people are building blocks of national identity.

Eighty years after his death, Trumpeldor's example continues to shine, teaching Israelis how to rally behind the blue and white flag and treat life's challenges with the shrug of "ayn davar," teaching Jews the world over how to walk with dignity, neither sauntering nor cowering; and, most important of all, reminding the Jewish people that there are ideals, there are individuals, who can serve as rallying points, as inspirations, and, most important of all, as touchstones of unity.

Call for help

Every once in a while, I get requests to help a particular cause gain public attention. This column is a response to such a request. It deals with schizophrenia, and if that subject is of no interest to you, it may not strike a responsive chord. But if only a very few of my readers indeed take up the suggestion made in this article, it will be worth writing about this particular illness. After all, helping to heal the sick is a mitzvah.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

This column is in fact a response to a letter received from the department of psychiatry and behavioral sciences at Johns Hopkins University, one of the most renowned medical institutions in the world. It publishes a monthly newsletter, of which I am a faithful subscriber and reader.

The writer introduces herself as a psychiatric epidemiologist and geneticist who for the past 20 years has been a researcher focusing on the biological basis of severe mental disorders, such as schizophrenia and bipolar disorders.

One of the teams is honing in on Jewish families of Ashkenazi descent – hence the request made of me. The letter says: "Why are we studying the Ashkenazim?

"One strategy that geneticists use to identify genes for complex disorders is to study more genetically homogeneous populations. Gene identification will hopefully lead to new medications and treatments for these disorders.

"Let me be clear: scientists do not think that there is a higher frequency of schizophrenia and bipolar disorders among the Ashkenazim. We believe that the rate of these illnesses is the same across different populations.

"How can you help? You can get the word out about our study. Unfortunately, the stigma of mental illness often prevents family members of affected individuals from coming forward. If you know of eligible families, you can help make them feel comfortable participating in our research study. We would like to study families that have at least one living relative with either schizophrenia or bipolar disorders. Members of my research team and I travel nationally, and would be happy to talk to members of your synagogue or organization.

"If you have any questions or suggestions, do not hesitate to call me at 410-955-0455. Working together, I hope that we can unravel the mysteries surrounding schizophrenia and bipolar disorder, and alleviate the suffering."

The writer is Dr. Ann E. Pulver, associate professor of psychiatry. If you have any questions, suggestions or information, please call her at the above number, or e-mail her at: Aepulver@welchlink.welch.jhu.edu. You will be making a contribution to an important medical pursuit.

Religion and state revisited

Far from the headlines, the underpinnings of a new status quo on religious-secular relations in Israel are being developed. The Knesset advocate for this is, ironically, in the National Religious Party (NRP).

Thus far, the NRP has been the defender of the existing framework, which clearly is no longer reflective of the complexities of Israeli demographics and behaviour. If passed, a new private member's bill proposed by MK Nachum Langental, would result in a virtual revolution on matters of religion and state.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

The bill would allow public transportation on Shabbat, civil marriage for those barred from religious ceremonies, civil burial, military service for all Israeli citizens, termination of religious councils and open places of entertainment on Shabbat. At the same time, the new bill would maintain conversion according to Halachah, prohibit trade or shopping on Shabbat, and expand Jewish studies in secular schools.

Langental's bill echoes a 1997 document prepared by Alex Lubotsky of Meimad (then a religious educational movement, which later became a party that joined Barak's One Israel in 1999), and Yossi Beilin (now minister of justice). They sought to replace the historic arrangements that had been put in place by David Ben-Gurion in 1947 in an effort to appease Agudat Israel, the Orthodox party, and to win its support for the establishment of the state. While the anachronistic nature of many of these arrangements has been widely acknowledged, and while 70(!) forums in Israel deal with matters of religion and state, many rabbis have no reason to change their behaviour unless forced to by law.

Langental's proposals already enjoy support on both the right and the left. They are viewed as a contemporary effort to bridge the gap between those who fear religious coercion and prefer a vision of Israel as a "state for all its citizens," and those who wish to protect the Jewish nature of the state and prefer a vision of Israel as a state governed by religious law. The new bill is again a compromise, but one that better reflects the realities of Israel in the 21st century.

The political significance of the bill is its origin in a religious party. The NRP had originally rejected the Meimad-Beilin document, as well as several proposals from secular parties for new arrangements. Now, several rabbis from the religious-Zionist camp have welcomed the proposal as a reasonable alternative to the inevitable breakdown of the existing framework that will likely come about through a combination of legal challenges in the Supreme Court and public discontent.

The bill also has a background of political tension within the NRP itself. The party is reeling from a recent devastating internal review conducted by Justice Sarah Frish. She criticized its leadership for losing touch with its constituency and for sacrificing its historic, domestic agenda for a single-minded focus on the territorial question and the battle against relinquishing land for peace. In the resulting battle for leadership of the party between Shaul Yahalom and the incumbent, Yitzhak Levy, both wish to appear moderate, progressive and responsive to quality-of-life issues.

Langental's bill does not deal with the demand for state recognition of Jewish religious pluralism from non-Orthodox Jewish streams. It continues to uphold conversion according to Halachah, in the spirit of the Ne'eman committee reforms (which were originally accepted by the Conservative and Reform movements).

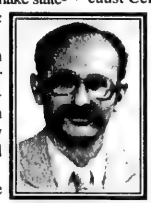
But the bill clearly responds to the Israeli reality of friction between secular and religious Israelis, and the new demands put on the system by the influx of Russian, non-Jewish immigrants, who are citizens according to the Law of Return, but are denied access to marriage, for example, because they are not halachically Jewish. And by calling for military service for all Israelis, the bill deals with the grievance many Israelis have against the exemption for service granted to haredi yeshiva students.

If the bill passes, it will be the first comprehensive, legislated attempt in 50 years to redraw the status quo on religious matters in the state. Like so many other issues, this one, too, requires reform, and the political will that can create the necessary conditions for it. This time around, the consensus may just be broad enough to pull it off.

A Canadian Jewish museum

Museums are imported instruments for shaping the identities of any society. They are not neutral collections. Decisions about what materials to collect and not to collect, and how to display them, make statements about the society or public sponsoring the museum.

One of Adolf Hitler's cars is in the collection of Canada's War Museum. After director Jack Granatstein discussed selling the car, an outcry of public opposition quickly settled the matter. The museum will keep the car.



Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

I have no idea if that was the correct decision. I also do not know if there is any Jewish perspective on the issue. Some people were afraid a neo-Nazi group would buy the car and turn it into some kind of shrine. But if the vintage car had fetched $20 million from a non-Nazi purchaser, the money might – in good conscience – have done a great deal of good for the fund-raising efforts for the Canadian War Museum.

One goal of the museum should be to help new generations of Canadians remember the reasons for our country's fight against the Nazis. The existence of Holocaust deniers like David Irving means that such reminders are crucial. But it is not immediately apparent that Hitler's car is essential. All sorts of other artifacts can symbolize the evil of the Third Reich.

No one is more obsessed with memory than Jews. The Montreal Holocaust Centre is in the midst of a major fund-raising campaign, leading to the building of an expanded Holocaust Centre and state-of-the-art museum as part of the Cummings House campus of FEDERATION CJA.

But what Montreal does not have – what Canada does not have – is a major Jewish museum. (If some Canadian cities already have such museums, my apologies.) This is really a shame. So if there are any Jewish philanthropists out there, allow me to suggest that there is a crying need, at both the national and local levels, for such institutions. They would complement nicely the impact of Holocaust centres.

A Quebec Jewish museum, like one for Ontario, or one for any other Canadian city or province, would have several functions. While it would be valuable as an educational instrument for Jews, notably, it would be equally valuable as an agency to inform non-Jews in various communities about Judaism and Jewish life.

In terms of content, there should be a dual emphasis. One would be the basic elements of Judaism and of Jewish history. It would be about Judaism and the Jewish people: Torah and prophets, the biblical period, Jewish languages, Jewish philosophy, the full range of the Diaspora experience, Jews and social change, Jewish creativity in art and music, great Jews like Sigmund Freud or Albert Einstein, Zionism and Israel, etc. The Holocaust would be just one part.

The other emphasis should be the specific role that Jews and the Jewish community have played in the life of Canada, and the specific regions in question, as well as specific features of Jewish life in the region. In Quebec, there would be much to include. Such a museum in Montreal would therefore differ, in its local dimensions, from one in Toronto, Winnipeg, or elsewhere. A prototype of such a museum was the successful roving exhibit on Canadian Jewry based on the book A Coat of Many Colours by Irving Abella.

New York has just built a major Jewish museum. Beth Ha'tefutsot in Israel is surely one of the best. But perhaps my favourite is one I visited in Australia – I think it was in Sydney. The Jewish museum there must be unlike any other. As many readers know, the first wave of European settlers in Australia included many convicts who were sent there as colonists.

So right near the entrance of this Australian Jewish Museum is a giant display proudly listing the names of Jewish convicts who were part of those original groups! Not a typical source of Jewish pride, but one that helps establish Australian Jewry as a valued early element in the Australian experience.

The Kirshner File

Varazdin — a town in Croatia without Jews

It is a prime example of a European town that has been ethnically cleansed of Jews.

In this part of the world, ethnic cleansing is nothing new. During the 1991-1995 secessionist war which accompanied the breakup of the old Yugoslavia, Serbs, Croats and Muslims were equally displaced and slaughtered in an orgy of tribal nationalism.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But long before these events convulsed the Balkans – traditionally the tinder-box of Europe – Jews fell victim to xenophobia and racism.

It happened after Germany's April 1941 invasion of Yugoslavia. Under the sponsorship of Germany, and with the support of its ally Italy, a Bosnian Croat fascist named Ante Pavelic proclaimed the Independent State of Croatia.

The puppet entity, controlled by Pavelic's Ustashe movement, consisted of territory cobbled together from Bosnia-Herzegovina, Slovenia and Dalmatia.

Emulating his mentors Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini, Pavelic declared war against the Serbs, the Jews and the Gypsies.

The Jews were treated harshly. First they were stripped of their rights. Then they were subjected to a series of racial decrees inspired by the 1935 Nuremberg Laws. And finally, they were deported, many dispatched to their deaths in the Jasenovac concentration camp south of Zagreb, the capital.

In Varazdin – a pleasant town which served as Croatia's capital from 1756 to 1776 – the same ferocious process unfolded.

Not long after seizing power, the Ustashe pounced on Varazdin's Jewish community, which, by the late 1930s, comprised seven percent of the town's population.

The 500 Jews were rounded up and transported to Jasenovac. Most were never seen again. The few survivors did not return to their homes.

I was given this information in Varazdin last October by a representative of the local tourist board. I was there with a group of journalists who had been invited to Croatia by the Croatian National Tourist Office in New York City and Lufthansa Airlines. Ironic, you say? Perhaps. But times have changed.

On this grey autumn day, with the sun hardly peeking out of the clouds, we were shown around Varazdin, which lies on the road connecting Croatia with Hungary and which is best known for its rotund 15th-century Baroque castle and its bewitching central square.

Having visited these places, we were taken on a tour of Varazdin's old Jewish quarter. Our first stop was the synagogue, which was built in 1862, 85 years after Jews settled in Varazdin and 37 years after the first Jewish school in Croatia was opened here.

The shul, opposite a park, was converted into a movie theatre after the war. Closed for some time now, it is a pathetically ugly building, its garish salmon stucco facade peeling and imparting an impression of total neglect.

The only architectural evidence signifying that this was once a Jewish house of prayer is the high arched window on the left side, barely visible from the road.

To our regret, we were unable to gain entry. The doors were locked, and the guide, a young man intensely interested in Varazdin's Jewish dimension, had no key.

He told us there are plans to restore the facade and turn the building into a sports museum to be endowed by a Jewish Olympian who represented Yugoslavia at the summer games.

The Jewish cemetery, next to a cement factory, was nearby. The story is that Jews bought the land in 1803 and consecrated the cemetery in 1810.

There was a sign in Hebrew just inside the gates. It read: "Every man will go in peace." The tombstones, which were not in bad condition, lay peacefully under the shade of tall, graceful cypress trees.

As I wandered the grounds, trying to imagine what life must have been like here before the Holocaust swept everything away, it occurred to me that the cemetery was surely a fitting metaphor for Varazdin's vanished Jewish community.

Our next stop was Franjo Lovrec's immaculately maintained vineyard in the rolling, idyllic hills adjacent to the Slovenian border.

We were taken there for a wine-tasting session, and Lovrec and his wife were exceedingly accommodating.

But the trip to his winery seemed like an irrelevancy after the cemetery. The image of those sad, stolid, solitary gravestones remained engraved on my mind.

Scholar studies Dubrovnik's Jewish history

Ivana Burdelez, born and raised in Dubrovnik, a picturesque city abutting the Adriatic Sea, is a rarity among academics in Croatia.

To the best of her knowledge, she is the only non-Jewish scholar in this predominantly Catholic country who specializes in Dubrovnik's local Jewish history.

She has written about 30 papers on the Jews of Dubrovnik, known as the pearl of the Adriatic.

Sephardi Jews began settling in Dubrovnik, a major trade centre and now a famous tourist destination, after their expulsion from Spain in 1492.

From the 16th century onward, they congregated in a warren of streets off the Stradun, Dubrovnik's main thoroughfare, concentrating themselves on Zudioska ulica. In the mid-1600s, they built a synagogue, now the oldest in Croatia and certainly the oldest Sephardi shul in Europe. On the eve of World War II, less than 100 Jews lived in Dubrovnik. Today, it is home to less than 50 Jews.

By her reckoning, Jews were the most successful merchants in this city. In time, they established one of the most successful and important Sephardi communities on the southern Adriatic coast.

A linguist who can speak Ladino, Burdelez is associated with the Dubrovnik branch of the University of Zagreb. In the past number of years, she has organized several international conferences on Sephardi Jews in the Mediterranean basin.

"I've never seen anyone from Canada at these conferences," she said in an interview one evening.

She is now in the process of forming a group of young researchers whose goal is to publish a book on Jewish historical sources in Dubrovnik. And if Burdelez has her way, she will open a summer school here next August devoted to the study of Sephardi culture. The school will be run in co-operation with Tel Aviv University, Bar-Ilan University and universities in Spain, Italy and the United States.

Jewish Life

Linked to Queen Esther

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

Although Purim is still many weeks away, we are nevertheless into the months of Adar and our thoughts begin to move toward Queen Esther.

She is a Jewish heroine who almost needs no introduction. Esther is the pivotal figure upon whom rests the responsibility of saving the entire Jewish people.

Can we possibly say that Esther is a typical Jewish woman? Somehow Esther finds the strength within her to orchestrate a brilliant plan that saves her people. In defiance of all odds, Esther connects with her identity and stands committed to her faith.

But was Esther unique?

In the Torah readings this month we recount the sin of the golden calf. Moses is late descending from Mount Sinai and the people of Israel have decided that he is not returning and therefore they must construct an idol to lead them in the desert.

Perhaps we are witnessing the only time in history that a Jewish community based its entire faith on someone being punctual.

The Israelites turn to Aaron and insist that he construct a golden calf so they may worship it as they had witnessed the Egyptians worshipping. Aaron instructs them to collect all the gold they can find and bring it to him the next day.

At this point the rabbis in the midrash inform us of an important detail. Apparently, when the men of Israel turned to the women and asked them to donate their gold for the idol, the women all refused to contribute.

Without exception, the women were adamant about not participating in the construction of the idol. For this reason, according to the rabbis, the women were rewarded with the holiday of the Rosh Chodesh (the new month).

Each time the moon renews itself, the women of Israel are granted a special holiday celebrated among women. It is a time for women to bond together, pray together, learn together and share their Judaism.

Their commitment to their faith is commemorated every month by providing women with a window of time in which to express that commitment yet again. But what is the connection between the golden calf and the new moon?

The Hebrew calendar is set by the lunar month. We must observe the moon to document its cycles in order to assign the Hebrew months. Such close observation of a celestial entity could easily lead one into misguided realms of worship.

In fact, many ancient religions did worship the moon as a deity onto itself. Yet Judaism considered it safe to give this time into the hands of Jewish women. Because of their strength and commitment during the sin of the golden calf, Jewish women have proved themselves reliable in their faith – they will not be drawn to idolatry.

The identity of a Jew lies at the core of the Jewish woman. Queen Esther finds herself standing as a link in a long chain of committed Jewish women. We are all links in this chain.

Leadership's lessons

By RABBI ELI L. GARFINKEL

Rabbinic Reflections

In The Seven Habits of Highly Successful People, the best-seller by Stephen Covey that was required reading in my rabbinical school, the author describes two kinds of leaders who fail. The first kind of failed leader is the consensus builder, or one who leads in a completely democratic fashion without any guiding moral principles in the background.

Covey's second kind of failed leader is the charismatic one who leads an institution solely through the force of his own personality.

In parshat Ki Tissa, Aaron suffers from both of these flaws and thus causes God to contemplate wiping out b'nai Yisrael and starting over with Moses alone.

The first leadership mistake Aaron made was to lead Israel by consensus rather than by principle. When his brother failed to descend from the mountain, Aaron did not approach the crisis with the solid principles of monotheism and faith. Rather, he listened to the cries of the rabble and allowed the multitudes to dictate his response.

Had Aaron been a modern politician, he would have commissioned an opinion poll. But authentic leaders do not hold their moistened fingers to the wind every time a controversy brews. The opinion of the masses is but one of many things that effective leaders take into account, and the consensus of the majority might be ill-advised or even morally wrong.

In the narratives of Korach's rebellion and the priests of Ba'al, Moses and Elijah show us that real leaders operate on the basis of truths and principles and not on the opinions of a noisy crowd. It is too bad that Aaron was not around to hear the sage words of former British prime minister Margaret Thatcher: Consensus is the absence of leadership.

At one point, however, Aaron dropped his desire for consensus and acted like a charismatic leader. Aaron constructed the golden calf and a separate altar to the idol all by himself. Why did he not enlist b'nai Yisrael's help? A midrash from Leviticus Rabbah (10:3) says that Aaron thought it would be better if the blame for the golden calf fell entirely on him rather than on the nation at large.

Although the intent of this midrash is to whitewash Aaron, the legend exposes Aaron's latent charismatic tendencies. Aaron deluded himself into thinking that only he could save Israel, so he made the golden calf himself.

He should have said, "You people want an idol? Go ahead – make it yourself!" Doing so would have taught b'nai Yisrael to take responsibility for their actions, and they might have changed their minds after forming a golden calf committee. By hoarding responsibility as all charismatic leaders do, Aaron nearly ruined everything.

We can learn from Aaron's failures that a leader must never be swayed by the desire for consensus or attention. A leader, whether a CEO, a rabbi, or a high priest, must guide by means of firm principles and yet allow his charges to learn from their own efforts. Aaron never learned these lessons, but it is never too late for us.

Jewish magazines online

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When you've had your fix of TV news and daily newspapers and crave more depth, try reading a magazine, online. You'll find articles that will entertain, enlighten and even enrage. Today, a quick spin around the online periodical stand.

Please note that some magazines allow online access only to their current issue so that articles mentioned here may be replaced by new ones by the time you read this.

The current Jerusalem Report [http://www.jrep.com/] has a fascinating feature article about haredi Jews who have overlooked the warnings of rabbinical authorities by working in hi-tech and surfing the Web. There's also a portrait of Marshall Herskovitz, co-creator of the seminal yuppie TV show Thirtysomething and now Once and Again. Only the current issue of Jerusalem Report can be read online.

The monthly Hadassah magazine presents online its entire contents back to 1996 [http://www.hadassah.org/news/pub2main.html]. The current cover story "takes the pulse of Judaism's four religious streams and finds robust growth, a new emphasis on spirituality and text study, as well as vital controversies." Also in the mix, a portrait of Kirk Douglas and a look at Jewish Bombay.

Lilith: The Independent Jewish Women's Magazine [http://www.lilithmag.com/] takes a look at Penina Rosenblum's recent run for the Knesset and the turmoil it caused among the country's feminists. "Should they endorse the cosmetics entrepreneur in female solidarity, or should they withhold their support in opposition to the former model's use of her sexuality in her campaign?" Another article examines whether gender-segregated schools are good for girls.

Known for the leadership of former editor Norman Podhoretz, Commentary focuses on social and political issues from a conservative perspective [http://www.commentarymagazine.com/current.html]. In "Israel's Moment of Truth," Daniel Pipes argues that a soaring Israeli economy combined with a general "malaise" could lead the country into treaties with Arab countries that would have very regrettable outcomes.

Tikkun: A Bimonthly Jewish Critique of Politics, Culture & Society also has an online presence [http://www.tikkun.org/]. In its most recent issue, Tikkun editor Rabbi Michael Lerner looks at the rioting and civil disobedience in Seattle at the World Trade Organization meeting in his article "Protest in Seattle: The Modern Maccabees."

If you're still looking for more compelling reading, try these links [http://members.tripod.com/~jewish_links/JEWS/news.html] and the ones at Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=182].

And finally, a confession. Although Moment magazine [http://www.momentmag.com/] has many worthy articles between its covers, whenever I pick up the magazine, I immediately flip to its Spice Box page. There, eagle-eyed readers submit ads, billboards and announcements plagued by pesky syntax and vexing spelling mistakes. Imagine my delight to find a generous helping of Spice Box online [http://www.momentmag.com/search/index.html].

There's an ad for Awnings by Hamen. (With Purim just a few weeks away, now we finally know what became of the man who wanted to hang Mordechai!) And here are a couple of headlines that made me do a double-take: "Israeli doctors in Kazakhstan help poison victims" and "Southern Baptist Urged to Pay for Jews During High Holidays." Maybe he should have paid for a proofreader.

CORRECTION

In "How Syria views Golan Heights" (Feb. 17), the correct address for the Web site containing the letter to Judy Feld Carr from Yitzhak Rabin should have been [http://imageusa.com/ARTICLES/history.htm]. The CJN regrets the error.

A visit to Poland: monuments and graffiti

By PHILIP B. BERGER

Guest Voice

My closest friend and I recently travelled to Poland to visit concentration camps and to walk through areas where Jews were confined to ghettos.

During our visit we learned about Poland's commitment to reminding Poles and visitors about what Nazi Germany did to Poland during World War II. All of Warsaw is a monument to Polish suffering. It had to be rebuilt stone by stone after the Germans levelled it during an uprising by Warsaw citizens and the Polish army in the fall of 1944.

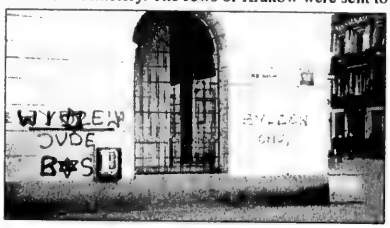
Plaques on almost every block of the old city commemorate Polish resistance fighters. The Pawiak Prison Museum commemorates the thousands of Poles who were tortured there and displays prisoners' possessions, including underwear made from Jewish prayer shawls.

At the site of the Warsaw Ghetto, a monument marks the uprising of the ghetto Jews who were killed in a six-week battle against the Nazis in 1943. A memorial marks the Umschlagplatz or square, where Warsaw's Jews were rounded up to be sent by rail to the Treblinka death camp.

At Treblinka, we stood in the eerie silence at the end of the railway spur where Jews were unloaded from cattle cars and forced directly through a long channel leading to the gas chamber. The Nazis razed Treblinka after using it to gas 900,000 Jews, but Poland has preserved the former camp site as a memorial.

Hundreds of small, twisted stones honour the dead, and the names of many Polish communities where the victims lived, are inscribed on larger stones. Sculpted black fragments resembling charred bones mark the pit where bodies were burned.

We saw the Jewish quarter of Krakow with its six synagogues and 400-year-old Jewish cemetery. The Jews of Krakow were sent to Auschwitz from a ghetto square that is now a bus terminal.



Graffiti in Lodz.

Elsewhere in Krakow is a plaque recalling one small success, the bombing by the Jewish Combat Organization of a café frequented by SS officers.

The museum at the Auschwitz concentration camp is free, open all but three days a year, and perfectly maintained.

The museum honours about a million Jews who died in the Auschwitz gas chambers and the thousands of Poles the Nazis tortured and executed. Luggage with the owners' names in big letters is stacked in the former barracks and is a testimony to Jews who were gassed and burned in Birkenau (Auschwitz II) three kilometres away.

But then in Lodz, the past and present meet in a different way. In 1939, 250,000 Jews lived in Lodz – today 220 remain.

To our horror, the walls of the city are covered with anti-Semitic graffiti. The favourite drawing is a gallows with a Jewish Star of David; these graffiti cover the only remaining synagogue in Lodz.

Two buildings down from the Jewish Community Headquarters, on a building recently restored to the Jewish community by agreement with the Polish government, a Jewish Star of David beside the word "gas" glares at passers-by.

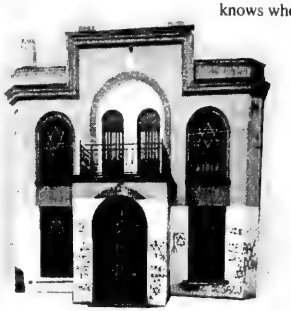
Only on the walls of the remaining cemetery – the largest Jewish cemetery in Europe – do large squares of whitewash indicate that somebody has painted over these hateful messages.

Shaken by what we saw, we asked Symcha Keller, the leader of the small Jewish community in Lodz, why there was so much graffiti. He explained that it was the work of small neo-Nazi parties and that everyone, including the Jewish community and the police, knows who is responsible.



A Lodz synagogue.

The Jewish community could not afford to provide security for the synagogue; it has other priorities, such as feeding its older members and developing a medical clinic.

The civic government seems unconcerned and indifferent, but the cemetery is somehow kept clean, perhaps because it is a tourist stop for visiting dignitaries.

Keller emphasized that the neo-Nazis are young and that anyone old enough to remember what Nazi Germany meant to Poland thought they were crazy.

Only on one wall in a square near Piotrkowska Street – the main street of Lodz – did we see graffiti proclaiming a "No Nazi zone." Presumably those who wrote it are also young.

Would that the swastikas and anti-Semitic messages that the remaining Jews of Lodz had to look at appeared only in the history books and museums – there is enough pain here.

Historian claims misuse of Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Holocaust has been misused and abused by Israeli governments, a Hebrew University philosopher claims.

In an interview recently, Avishai Margalit said that these abuses occurred during the premierships of Golda Meir and Menachem Begin in the 1970s and 1980s.

Margalit, here to deliver the Harry Crowe Memorial Lecture on The Ethics of Memory, at York University, recalled that Begin once compared a Syrian attack against Christians in Lebanon – which left a few casualties – with the Holocaust.

"This was a travesty," he said.

For her part, Meir likened the assimilation of Jews to spiritual destruction, concluding that it was worse than the Holocaust.

"I found that very offensive," Margalit said.

Margalit, however, praised Begin for having given Sephardi Jews in Israel a better appreciation of the Holocaust, which he described as a unique historical event.

Margalit, whose essays regularly appear in the New York Review of Books, said that he is impressed with the Holocaust monument Germany is currently building in the centre of Berlin.

But he fears that it will become a magnet for neo-Nazi vandalism, and will have to be guarded around the clock.

Turning to the latest political developments in Austria, Margalit endorsed Israel's decision to recall its ambassador from Vienna in protest over the far right-wing Freedom party's inclusion in the governing coalition.

Describing its leader, Jorg Haider, as "an ambitious cynic who can go in all directions," Margalit said that he is basically a populist who peddles a nostalgic view of Austria's Nazi past.

Nevertheless, Haider is not a neo-Nazi, he noted.

In the last three years, Haider has tried very hard to apologize for his inflammatory statements about Nazi Germany, the Waffen SS and concentration camps.

Comparing such an agreement to the doomed 1919 Versailles Treaty, which ended World War I but sowed the seeds of World War II, he said that it would create a strong irredentist faction in the Palestinian movement and strengthen Islamic fundamentalists.

Endorses Israel's policy towards Haider

A realistic solution, Margalit mused, should be based on the unofficial 1995 Abu Maizin-Beilin plan. Under its provisions, the Palestinians would control 90 percent of the West Bank, while Israel would maintain settlement blocs there and retain the annexed eastern part of Jerusalem.

In exchange for a peace treaty with Syria, Margalit said, Israel should withdraw from the whole of the Golan Heights.

Embracing the late Yitzhak Rabin's formula, he said that the depth of an Israeli withdrawal should correspond to the depth of peace Syria is prepared to offer Israel.

By his estimation, Syria's president, Hafez al-Assad, is still torn between two poles.

If he reaches an agreement with Israel, his hold on Syria may be weakened. But if he does not sign an accord, Syria will be thrown into further isolation.

"We don't know which route Assad will follow. But in all probability, he wants to strike a deal."

'All of Jewish history' appears in high tech quilt

By BEN ROSE
CJN Reporter

TORONTO — A "hi-tech" quilt titled Mirrors of our Lives has been presented to the Baycrest Centre by 18 Holocaust survivors living in the Baycrest Terrace. The average age of the survivors is 85.

"All of Jewish history is here," said Fela Karmoile, who, with Eva Schwebel, made the presentation on behalf of their colleagues. "This quilt is part of Judaism, it's just not plain cloth."

The quilt, which is 11 feet wide, is a product of computer graphics technology and photo transfer on fabric. Each 10-inch square was contributed by one of the survivors. The squares are a memorial to events of the past, but with the addition of "hi-tech" art, they are also a living testament to the children and grandchildren of the survivors.

Their families and friends recently gathered in the Wagman Centre assembly room to view the quilt, which Baycrest survivors co-ordinator Paula David said "is not only a remembrance of their pain and sorrow, but a tribute to their accomplishments since they came to Canada."

The 18 squares depict life in happier times, attempts to lift spirits in the ghettos established by the Nazis, faded passports, photos of family members who died in the Holocaust, and bright-eyed pictures of grandchildren. It is a remarkable account of a unique time in history, and the quilt is being given a place of honour on the wall in the foyer of the Wagman Centre and the Baycrest Terrace.

Born in Ostrowicz, Poland, Muschkies, who lost her husband Shmuel in the Holocaust, came to Canada in 1948. Gathered around her at the presentation were her daughter Helen, son-in-law Irving Mueller, and a granddaughter, Sherry Zweig, who was there with her three children. Muschkies has another daughter, Ruth Webber.

David paid tribute to Karen Rose, a teacher of nursing arts at George Brown College, who worked with the survivors in making the quilt, copied the precious photos and returned every one of them intact. Her husband, Alvin Gallay did the computer graphics.

David presented a gift book copy of Holocaust poetry by Baycrest residents to Malca Sufrin, Janice Katz and Chaya Nativ, three members of the Pomegranate Guild who helped with the needlework.

The quilt becomes part of the permanent art collection at Baycrest Centre, which has one of the largest groups of aging Holocaust survivors of any facility in North America.

The 18 survivors whose names appear under their squares are Hilda Applebaum, Olga Avraham, Vera Berger, Chana Fish, Ann Goldsmith, Mina Gurfinkle, Mira Jafine, Fela Karmoile, Sara Herman, Mina Lauterpacht, Molly Muschkies, Leah Shore, Ilona Polger, Klara Roboz, Eva Schwebel, Chana Stein, Miriam Weisz and Berta Zolty.

Songs celebrate 1,000 years of Yiddish

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Zimriya 2000 was a meeting of old and new – the first zimriyah of the new millennium celebrated 1,000 years of Yiddish.

The zimriyah or music festival of day and supplementary schools, an annual event presented by the Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was held recently at the Minkler Auditorium.

Some 500 children from 15 different schools participated in the choral festival, which was divided into afternoon and morning concerts that drew more than 1,000 people. Many sang along with the children as they performed familiar Yiddish favourites, including Oifn Pripetchick, Tumbalalaikah and Az der Rebbe Tanst.

Zimriyah 2000

Inter-school programs co-ordinator Shula Saltzman, who was also the stage manager of the zimriyah, helped organize the program with musical director Klara Bagley.

Saltzman said that holding the festival in a theatre was necessary this year because the number of participants had increased beyond the capacity of the synagogues. "We needed a space to accommodate all the children."

She said the acoustics were excellent in this new venue, adding to the overall success of the concert.

Shirley Worth, chair of the BJE, said the zimriyah is one of the only times the students get to see the range of the BJE schools.

She said the theme of this year's zimriyah – 1,000 years of Yiddish – was exciting. The zimriyah, she said, "has given the children an experience, [a chance] to learn about a special part of our culture that we thought would die.

"I hope this will be an opportunity to learn more about our rich culture, history and heritage."

Dr. Seymour Epstein, executive director of the BJE, thanked the participants: "So many people have given so much time to create this special moment for us."

He said the Jews as a people "have always sung our way though history."

The participating schools – all part of the Festival Choir that opened and closed the show – included Associated Hebrew Schools, Shaar Shalom Religious School, Leo Baeck Day School, the Downtown Jewish Community School, the Morris Winchevsky School, United Synagogue Congregation Schools, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Toronto Heschel School, Beth Tikvah Congregational School, Temple Emanu-el Religious School, Beth Sholom Congregational School, Netivot HaTorah Day School, Beit Rayim Hebrew School, United Synagogue Day School.

The accompanying musicians were Alla Sagalov and David Verkh.

Aish HaTorah set for 18th anniversary

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A gala concert will mark the start of celebrations for Aish HaTorah's 18th Toronto anniversary.

The concert, titled A Celebration of Music, will be held at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts on March 15. It will feature Oshy Tugendhaft and the Sydenham South African Men's Choir.

Gavin Opert, who is producing the show for Aish HaTorah, said the program was originally staged in Johannesburg in 1993, to mark the 50th anniversary of the Sydenham Hebrew Congregation.

"Celebration, which combines live music, recorded orchestral backings and an audio-visual production of specially created slides, comprises six musical themes portraying the triumph of Jewish destiny, and the cherished traditions and values that make up the Jewish people," Opert said.

Also appearing will be the Eitz Chaim Boys Choir, directed by Yehuda Gilden, and the Kol Tov Band.

Aish HaTorah was founded some 25 years ago by Rabbi Noach Weinberg. Norm Grafstein, co-chair of the anniversary celebrations, chair of the Aish HaTorah Thornhill branch, and vice-president of Aish HaTorah Canada, told The CJN that "people were walking away [from Jewish tradition] without knowing what they were walking away from."

Rabbi Weinberg wanted to show unaffiliated Jews what Judaism is all about, Grafstein said. The philosophy is not necessarily to make people Orthodox, but to educate them about Judaism, he explained.

When Rabbi Weinberg realized that in Toronto's large Jewish community less than half were affiliated with a synagogue, he decided that there must be outreach, said Grafstein.

Oshy Tugendhaft

In 1982, Toronto Aish HaTorah opened, with Rabbi Sholom Schwartz at the helm, along with four other Aish staffers.

"Rabbi Schwartz was a Torontonian. He went to Israel an unaffiliated Jew. Then he became interested in Aish HaTorah, and stayed." He continued his studies and eventually received smichah, rabbinic ordination.

Grafstein, who has been involved with the organization since its inception, said that it started in a basement at Bathurst and Glencairn. Then it moved to "a former pool hall" nearby, and finally into its current home on Clark near Bathurst in Thornhill.

There are two other local branches – the Village Shul, on Eglinton Avenue, west of Bathurst Street, and the newest Toronto-area location, Aish HaTorah Westmount, on Bathurst Street, north of Centre Street.

"Eight (thousand) to 10,000 people a year come to our programs," said Grafstein.

While each branch has its own rabbi, Rabbi Aaron Hoch is Toronto Aish HaTorah's education director. Alan Seidenfeld is the new chair, who oversees a board comprised of many of the original directors, such as Grafstein himself, Harvey Hecker, Joe Berman and immediate past chair Harold Nashman.

The Toronto organization is the second Aish HaTorah in North America (the first was in St. Louis). There are now 12 branches, in such places as Denver, Los Angeles and Las Vegas. There are also branches in the FSU, Israel, England, Chile and Australia.

Originally, said Grafstein, "we opened the branches." Now, he said, "similar outreach organizations come and say that they want to affiliate with us."

The highlight of the 18th anniversary celebrations, will be a gala dinner on June 8, which will honour Herb and Joyce Green, and the Aish HaTorah rabbis.

Tickets for the concert are $36 and $60. To reserve, or for more information, call 905-764-1818, ext. 371.

Realizing emotional attachment

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TEL AVIV — Standing atop the former fortress of King Herod, Tuvia Book related the fascinating tale of the Roman siege on Masada.

In Yad Vashem's Avenue of Right-eous Gentiles, he told a group of 40 Torontonians about Denmark's resis-tance to the Nazis and the heroic acts of non-Jews who saved countless lives during the Holocaust.

At Kibbutz Misgav Am, close to the Lebanese border, Book spoke of the three months he spent in Lebanon serving in the Israeli army.

Book and 32 madrichim (leaders), from across Canada, as well as Israeli medics and tour guides, led hundreds of young Canadians across Israel, last week as part of Birthright Israel – a new project spearheaded by Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt to bring young Jews from the Diaspora to Israel.

Tamara Kochberg, program co-ordi-nator for Koach, a Conservative outreach program on campus, led a group of Conservative Jews across Israel last week.

People within her group said that the trip was the best experience of their lives, she said.

"I've had people say they want to have Shabbat dinners with family, when they have never had it before. I've had people say they would be interested in being involved in educational programs related to the holocaust because they were moved at Yad Vashem," she said.

"Before they came, they knew about Israel, but they hadn't realized their emotional attachment. Now, lots of people have come up to me and said they never thought they would feel the way they do about the country. They never thought they would feel so pas-sionately about a place," he said.

For Dan Tweyman, a 21-year-old University of Toronto student, it was the children's memorial in Yad Vashem that moved him. Points of light flick-ered in remembrance of the 1.5 million children who died during the Holocaust. Looking at this memorial, he thought of what the world would have been like had these children not been killed.

"If each of these points of light rep-resents a thought, an idea, what a beau-tiful place this would be," he said.

"When I was standing there, I could feel the love and the strength and the pride of the Jewish people," she said.

But she also felt an incredible sadness. "I was sad because there was so much need – there were so many notes in that wall."

Abrams said she was also affected by her tour guide – Tuvia Book's – pas-sionate dedication to Israel and to Judaism and the fact that the former British resident had volunteered for the Israeli army.

"He wasn't just telling the stories. He had lived it. It was a passion to him, because he had been there in the army, he fought for his country. He put his heart into wanting to teach us about it."

Michelle Lackie, director of the Centre for Jewish Campus Life at U of T and a madrichah for one of the Toronto groups said the goal of the trip was not to dictate to the young Jews what they should be learning. Rather the learning was meant to be self-generat-ed, she said.

"I'm trying to get their interest [to come] from inside and get that to grow. That, to me, should fuel them."

McGill student tries to 'fully understand' his Judaism

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Four years ago, Neil Grunberg's ideal trip would have meant travelling to the United Kingdom with his rugby team.

But since then, he has experienced an awak-ening of his Judaism and now his wish is to travel to Israel.

"The only way to fully understand my Judaism, to grasp it completely, would be to visit Israel," he says.

Grunberg, 22, a fourth-year bachelor of commerce student at McGill University is one of the 1,000 young Canadians travelling to Israel as part of the Birthright Israel program. One of the goals of the program is to reach out to unaffiliated Jews.

Other than the weekly Hebrew classes he took in preparation for his bar mitzvah, Grunberg had little involvement in the Jewish community growing up.

But when he reached McGill, that changed.

He was "rushed" (in frat terms, this means recruited) by AEPi, a Jewish fraternity.

AEPi's main value is being a mentsch, he said, and as a result, Grunberg found himself helping out in his local com-munity. Over the years, Grunberg has sat on the univers-ity's charity food drive committee, its annual basketball com-mittee and he has spoken about his grandmother's Holo-caust experiences during a Kristallnacht ceremony.

His involvement with AEPi brought him closer to move-ments like Hillel and Chabad, which also made him more conscious of his Judaism and more involved in his com-munity.

In fact, it is the closeness and warmth of the Jewish com-munity that impresses him most about Jewish culture, he says.

Neil Grundberg

"The important thing is that you are Jewish. It doesn't matter if you are from Toronto, Montreal, Venezuela. You can walk into a Chabad house, a Hillel house or a Jewish family's home and they will welcome you with open arms," he said.

Grunberg expects to experience this same Jewish warmth when he visits Israel.

"That will be amazing – the fact that we will be so many miles away from home but will be treated like family because we share Judaism".

To Grunberg, Judaism is more about being part of a tightly-knit community than about having a strong spiritual connection so he does not foresee himself being spiritually moved in Israel, he said.

What he is looking forward to most is experiencing Israeli culture.

"I think it will be vastly different from anything I have ever seen before," he said.

Grunberg, who has never been to Israel, is currently touring the Jewish homeland and returns to Canada on Monday.

'Seeing is believing' at Waterloo optometry school

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Your neighbourhood optometrist may be a graduate of the University of Waterloo's School of Optometry.

You should not be surprised.

Jacob (Jake) Sivak was director of the School of Optometry from 1984 to 1990 and again from 1993 to 1999. During this period, it produced 660 graduates, or approximately 20 percent of the number of optometrists currently practising in Canada.

Seeing is believing.

Sivak, now in his mid-50s, was recently named dean of graduate studies at the University of Waterloo, rated by Maclean's magazine as Canada's best overall institution of higher learning.

He has compiled an enviable record as a scholar, being the author of over 190 papers on the optical development of the eye and holding six patents on optical devices and processes.

As a researcher, he is interested in the phenomenon of "refractive errors."

"Myopia, or near-sightedness, is the most prevalent form of refractive error," he explains. "In North America, the percentage of the population that is myopic is about 25 percent. It is much higher in Asian countries.

"Hyperopia, or far-sightedness, is the other primary refractive error. The cause has been the source of great controversy for more than 150 years. We now believe that it is caused by some combination of genetic and environmental factors. My research deals with the environmental influences."

Sivak also delves into the study of cataract development and prevention, where, he notes, a breakthrough is always possible.

Over the years, Sivak has collaborated with several Israeli scientists, mostly at the Technion in Haifa. "My family and I spent a sabbatical year at the Technion, and we have been back a few times for stays of between two weeks and three months."

Optometry, says Sivak, fuses elements of medicine, biology, physics, ophthalmology and psychology. It is an exciting field because vision is such a fundamental and important sense.

Jacob (Jake) Sivak

And in optometry, he adds, the movement from basic research to application is quite fast.

Sivak's odyssey to optometry began when he was a student at McGill University majoring in science.

"I applied to study optometry at the University of Montreal because I only needed two years of science to get in. At that point in my life, I didn't really know what I wanted to do. I wasn't thrilled with academic work, and here was an interesting profession where I could make a living.

"I liked the appearance of the shiny optical devices in optometrists' offices, and it was relatively easy to gain admission into the program. Today, it is one of the most difficult to get into."

Sivak was born and raised in Montreal. His parents, Max (Motel) and Chienke, were immigrants from Eastern Europe. For about seven years in the 1930s, they lived in Palestine, where his sister, Mia, was born. When they returned, they were involved in the formation of Hashomer Hatzair in Canada.

After graduating from the University of Montreal, Sivak honed his skills. He studied physiological optics at Indiana University, physiology at Cornell University and optometry at the Pennsylvania College of Optometry.

In 1972, he joined the faculty of the University of Waterloo as an assistant professor in the School of Optometry, and received a cross-appointment in the department of biology several years later.

Sivak is a rarity among academics because he has remained at one university during his entire career. "I like the University of Waterloo, and my family has enjoyed living in Kitchener-Waterloo. I have received offers and expressions of interest from other universities, but I like the informal and fairly open style of the University of Waterloo."

Sivak and his wife, Barbara, a physiotherapist and half-time professor of anatomy and pathophysiology, live a little over a mile from the university campus. They belong to a local synagogue, Temple Shalom.

The Sivaks have three children: Alisa, 30, who lives in Waterloo with her husband Ivan and works for the Kitchener Multicultural Centre; Jeremy, 27, a PhD candidate in developmental biology at Tufts University in Boston; and Benjamin, 23, a science student in his final year at the University of Toronto.

Coast to Coast

Surviving, but at what cost?

A couple of months ago, if one asked which member of Parliament was least prone to antagonize other MPs, the answer almost surely was Jane Stewart. When answering hostile questions in her previous portfolios, Stewart could always be relied upon to respond with a smile and find a way to raise the tone of debate to a constructive, even cordial level.

No longer. The Human Resources minister has quickly become a tough, street-savvy politician. Grenades lobbed in her direction are now routinely answered with missiles of her own. The Commons floor sounds like a battlefield and the protagonists have taken on the look of war-weary soldiers. What has happened to Jane Stewart? In a word, "politics."

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Her reputation has been sullied and her ethics have been called into question. Her two children now routinely hear Stewart accused of being a "liar" and "deceiving Canadians about the truth behind the grants disbursed by her department." Stewart's transformation is nothing more than the manifestation of the survival instinct.

Repeatedly attacked, Jane Stewart had two choices: flight or fight. She has chosen, at least for the moment, to fight. And that is good news for Canada because Jane Nixon Stewart is a decent and honest individual whose motivation for entering political life was a genuine hope to make a meaningful contribution to the country.

And, although it sometimes may not appear so, there are many other decent and honest people who serve as her colleagues – on all sides of the House. Ironically, Stewart's chief antagonist is one such person. Diane Ablonczy, a Reform MP from Calgary is as gentle and kind-hearted an individual as one could ever meet. Notwithstanding her currently heartfelt outrage at what she perceives to be government wrongdoing, Ablonczy, like Stewart, truly wants to make a difference, a constructive difference.

So how can it be that two, such fundamentally decent people are duking it out in the chambers of Parliament? In a word, "politics."

For you see, dear readers, politics has become all about survival. And survival is all about toughness, how tough you can "stick it to the government" or how tough you can withstand the onslaught of opposition attacks. Many Ottawa watchers were hoping that it would be the Stewarts and Ablonczys who would change Ottawa. Instead, it would appear that they have been changed by Ottawa, and that, dear readers is not good news for Canada.

Still hope for peace, leading scholar says

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Many Israelis feel that Syria is interested in the peace process, but not in peace with Israel, yet there is hope for a peace settlement, says a leading scholar in the field of Syrian-Israeli relations.

Prof. Moshe Maoz, the author and editor of several books on Middle East politics, a history professor at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem recently spoke at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre. The event was sponsored by the Israeli Embassy.

The type of peace and the terms of the settlement are complex issues and Israeli opinion is divided, Maoz said. "The problem is that Israelis want the Arabs to love us." He cautioned that "there is no love in the Middle East. We are not going to have peace as Canada has with the United States."

Maoz said regaining the Golan Heights is an incentive for Syria to make peace with Israel. "If it remains in Israel, Syria will want to fight for it."

When asked about the importance of the Golan in the peace process, he said: "The Syrians want the Golan and they realize they can only get it back through diplomacy...war has not worked.

Understanding one another is a key to any future, successful peace in the region, said Maoz. "It has been a long, long, long conflict and we cannot expect it to be healed overnight.

"There has been a mutual ignorance of one another's history, society, culture. We have to educate each other and it is a long process."

A successful peace will be peace based on common values and this, said Maoz, is a challenge.

While in Ottawa, Maoz also spoke at Temple Israel, Congregation Agudath Israel and Carleton University, and he met with various government officials.

Students make statement against drunk driving

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — How can you properly memorialize a young husband, son and father who was killed by a teenage drunk driver?

Students at the London Community Hebrew Day School decided the best way was to educate fellow young people about the dangers of alcohol and drug abuse.

After Roberto Mendel died, his parents, here visiting from Chile, asked Janet Nish-Lapidus, the school principal, how best to educate young children about the dangers of alcohol.

Nish-Lapidus formed a club of seven students, including Mendel's daughter, Simone, "to talk, research, and produce a booklet," she told The CJN.

The result was a 16-page booklet, called Kids to Kids About Drugs. Since its publication in September, 1999, it has been distributed at the school in grades four to eight, as well as in some pediatricians' and dentists' offices, and to various schools in the London public school system in conjunction with a Grade 6 program about drugs and alcohol.

Production and distribution of the booklet has been subsidized by Roberto Mendel's parents.

The seven youngsters (and Nash-Lapidus) worked on the project for several months last year. Layout and production were done by local high school children.

Kids to Kids About Drugs is written in simple, "kid-friendly" language, with much use of point form, cartoons (one says "The best kind of beer for kids is root beer.") and a crossword.

Despite this, the book is a serious work. Youngsters can learn about the signs of having an alcohol or drug problem, information about how drugs and alcohol work, the dangers, and where to turn for help.

There are some chilling statistics, such as the fact that one person is injured every five minutes, one person dies every six hours, and that "Young people are more likely to die in a motor vehicle crash than any other way and almost 40 percent of the time alcohol is involved. In the most recent roadside survey, one out of ten 16-24 year olds had been drinking and driving."

If it is true that children are more likely to listen to their peers rather than their parents or teachers, then this booklet is a worthwhile and helpful endeavor.

New, merged synagogue rises in Niagara Falls

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two synagogues, combining the Reform and Conservative streams of Judaism, have merged to form Bnai Tikvah, a new shul in Niagara Falls.

The two synagogues merging are Temple Tikvah in St. Catharines and Bnai Jacob in Niagara Falls.

A Reform service will be held on Friday evenings twice a month, and a Conservative, or traditional, service will be held Saturday mornings, every week.

"The only way they could survive is by combining and they are to be congratulated," said Michael Soberman in a report to the Ontario region executive of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"We have seen too much of arguments between different streams of Judaism in North America and Israel," said Soberman.

"Bnai Tikvah is still an infant. How it will grow up we don't know. We do know today, however, that it holds great promise. It ensures a Jewish presence in Niagara Falls and perhaps it sends a message."

A merged Hebrew school has 40 young children as students and the new shul has a membership of 60 families, he said.

The 40 students gather together every Sunday for three hours of Jewish studies, said Chuck Shulman, formerly of Temple Tikvah and now co-president of the new shul. The other co-president is Bobby Muller, a third generation member of Bnai Jacob.

Congregation Bnai Jacob had always been an unaffiliated Conservative synagogue and the Reform Temple Tikvah had been affiliated with UAHC (Union of American Hebrew Congregations), said Mandel.

At a time when small Jewish communities are facing challenges, such as declining membership and divisions between the various streams of Judaism, the new shul demonstrates that survival is essential, said Mike Wierzba, spiritual leader of Congregation Bnai Tikvah.

Holocaust museum will be at the cutting edge

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — By the summer of 2001, Montreal will have a Holocaust museum that will be among the most advanced in North America and draw upwards of 100,000 visitors a year.

Those are the ambitious plans of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, which is engaging the services of two top Holocaust museum designers to create the two-storey installation at the Montreal Jewish Community Campus.

"The museum will be at the cutting-edge of Holocaust exhibitions and among the most effective centres for Holocaust education. We will be employing every possible technology to create a meaningful way of explaining the history of the Jews and what the Holocaust means for people today," said Bill Surkis, the centre's executive director.

Consultants to the multimillion-dollar project are Patrick Gallagher of Washington, who designed the recently opened New York Museum of Jewish Heritage and Living Memorial of the Holocaust, and Yitzchak Mais of Tel Aviv, designer and curator of the Lubavitch Museum in Brooklyn.

"There are very few Holocaust museum experts of world renown. Gallagher and Mais are the very best amongst those few," said Surkis.

The exhibition will be put together mainly from the 50,000 pieces of memorabilia and artifacts that have been donated by Montrealers, primarily survivors, and are now being stored in three off-site locations. Use will also be made of the over 500 videotaped testimonies of survivors that have been recorded by the centre in the past few years.

Surkis believes the museum will be a major tourist attraction. Projections are that the new museum will attract almost double the 37,600 annual visits the centre was receiving in its former location, to about 75,000 in its first year.

"That will probably go up to 100,000 by its second year," Surkis said.

Private fund-raising has been going on in the Jewish community over the past months. That will be expanded into a public campaign shortly, Surkis said, and money will be sought, in particular, from corporations.

A blue-ribbon "comité des sages" has been assembled to lend their names to the campaign. Members include: Roman Catholic Archbishop of Montreal, Cardinal Jean-Claude Turcotte; filmmaker Denys Arcand; former Le Devoir publisher Lise Bissonnette, now head of the Grand Bibliothèque du Québec; Jules Deschênes, the retired judge who headed the federal government's inquiry into suspected Nazi war criminals; Phyllis Lambert, director of the Canadian Centre for Architecture; and former Quebec Superior Court chief justice Alan B.Gold.

The project has received a $105,000 grant from the City of Montreal, payable over three years, and federal and provincial support will be sought.

The centre reopened this month in Cummings House after spending a year in Cavendish Mall while campus renovations were done. It is now located on the ground floor, with its entrance just off the lobby, giving the centre much greater visibility. For the first 20 years of its history, the centre was on the lower level, accessible only by elevator.

By 2001, the exhibition area will be at least twice its current size and cover two floors: the ground floor and the one immediately below it. An internal elevator and staircase have been installed to connect the two levels.

Although plans are not final, Surkis envisages that visitors will begin their tour on the ground floor, proceed to the lower level, and then return to the main area.

Until the new museum is complete, the centre will show the temporary exhibition, Children of the Holocaust: Legacy of a Vanished Generation. It is an overview of Jewish life before the war, the rise of anti-Semitism, the deportations and concentration camps, and how survivors rebuilt their lives, focusing on the experiences of children.

This show was first mounted in 1985, but has been updated and now incorporates some of the elements of the centre's former permanent exhibition. The area is still a bit rough with the ceiling's ducts and wiring exposed, but is open to the public Sunday through Thursday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

During construction, Surkis said, "we will attempt to work on one floor at a time, so that we will be able to continue with the temporary exhibit. Actual construction is expected to take six months, but there will be no heavy work like putting up walls, so it should be possible to keep open to the public."

A memorial room separate from the museum will also likely be added, immediately off the lobby, so that people coming into the building can use it without having to go through the exhibition area.

About 65 percent of the centre's visitors are not from the Montreal Jewish community, Surkis said, and of those, about half are francophones.

He anticipates that French Quebecers' interest in the Holocaust will increase with the adoption by the National Assembly, in December, of a bill officially recognizing Holocaust Day.

The first to tour the centre, since its reopening this month, was a group of 65 students from the French private school, Collège Notre-Dame.

While there, three men from China, tourists in Montreal, walked in. They spoke neither English nor French, so the two docents – child survivors – had difficulty helping them get much out of what they saw.

"As it turned out, there was one student [in the group] who spoke Mandarin, and he offered to translate the docents' commentary for them. It's just one incredible story about how the legacy of the Holocaust is being transmitted in Montreal," Surkis said.

New chapel 'a work of art'

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A memorial chapel has been built at the New Jewish Community Cemetery in Osgoode (near Ottawa).

Following the death of his wife, Pearl, in 1995, Sidney Cwinn decided that the construction of a chapel would be a fitting tribute to her. He then undertook to design and donate the structure in her memory and in memory of other departed members of his family.

At the recent dedication ceremony, attended by a small group of invited guests and members of the local clergy, Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka outlined the story of Cwinn's effort.

"This chapel," Rabbi Bulka recounted, "was conceived by Sidney on the face of a paper napkin in the midst of a meeting concerning this matter, and carried through to its most intricate detail by Sidney, as he personally went over every detail and was there on site to assure that all the delicate nuances of this superb building were correctly implemented."

The chapel is a work of art. Mayer Alvo, chair of the Ottawa Jewish Cemeteries, noted that "Sidney Cwinn built the Chapel with class and with total dedication and sincerity."

Both the design and materials for the chapel are replete with symbolism. The five-sided building symbolizes the five books of Moses. Five stained glass windows reflect the sunlight. Inside, the roof contains five main laminated beams made of Douglas fir from Northern Alberta. The pulpit, the visitor"s signing board and the Aron Kodesh, all hand-carved oak, were designed by Cwinn.

Microphones and a speaker system allow the proceedings to be heard by kohanim who must remain outside the chapel. Also outside, a wash basin and benches have been provided, as well as two fully heated bathroom facilities.

"This is intended to be a place not merely for the departed," Rabbi Bulka said, "but for the living, to come, to meditate, to contemplate, to find peace and solace."

Barak-Mubarak relations suffer loss of confidence

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Relations between Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak have become somewhat strained, with Mubarak telling the Palestinians he doubts Barak intends to reach a deal with them.

According to a source close to the Palestinian Authority, Mubarak was critical of Barak in a Cairo meeting last Thursday with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat. The source said Mubarak referred to a telephone conversation he had had with Barak the day before.

"Barak called me to say he is committed to moving forward in the negotiations with the Palestinians, but I don't believe him," Mubarak reportedly told Arafat.

In the phone call, Mubarak criticized the Israeli air raids on infrastructure facilities in Lebanon, but Barak apparently got a different impression. He told Yediot Ahronot in a weekend interview that "between the lines" he heard a "compliment" from Mubarak.

Thus Mubarak's weekend trip to Beirut – the first visit to Lebanon in 50 years by an Egyptian head of state – and the Egyptian president's harsh criticism of the Israeli attacks took official Israel by surprise.

Until last week, Mubarak was careful not to criticize Barak in public, and indeed had used his political leverage on Arafat to prevent crises. The last meeting between Barak and Mubarak in Cairo three weeks ago was termed successful by both leaders.

On Sunday, Barak's chief of staff, Danny Yatom, and his counterpart in Foreign Minister David Levy's office, Alon Pinkas, went to Cairo to meet with Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa, in the hope of patching up the relationship between Israel and Egypt. They explained Israel's policies in Lebanon, emphasizing Barak's determination to be out of Lebanon by July and explaining that the security cabinet is opposed to any strikes at civilians, but that Hezbollah is using civilian bases for their attacks on IDF troops in the security zone.

A diplomatic source speculated last night that Mubarak fears a freeze in the peace process could create regional instability. The source said the stepped-up Egyptian criticism was meant to signal to Barak that Egypt is growing disappointed with the pace of events: "As far as the Egyptians are concerned, if the process is renewed with Syria and there's an agreement with the Palestinians, everything will be fine. But if everything remains stuck, they'll start seeing Barak as a Netanyahu clone."

Mubarak is scheduled to go to Washington next week, and Israeli sources say he wants to focus on the peace process, in part to leave stickier issues, such as human rights in Egypt, off the agenda.

Despite all the criticism, relations between the two countries appear to be proceeding normally. Agriculture Minister Haim Oron was in Egypt on an official visit as a guest of his Egyptian counterpart during the Israeli raids on the electrical plants in Lebanon, and the visit was widely covered by the Egyptian press in a positive light, although more vituperative pieces appeared in the opinion pages.

Oron, accompanied by his counterpart, visited private farms that use Israeli technology and promised to take home an Egyptian request to open Israeli markets to fresh Egyptian produce.

As for Israel's plans for a July withdrawal from Lebanon, Barak told the senior command of the IDF on Sunday that he was determined to go ahead with the withdrawal by July.

One voice of dissent was heard by the commander of IDF colleges, Major General Ya'acov Amidror, who said that moving the IDF back to the international border because soldiers were falling victim to Hezbollah attacks was "irresponsible reasoning."

He said that "according to that same logic, we can't defend anything anywhere. It's an immoral argument because it puts civilians on the front lines of combat."

PM sets May as new deadline for PA deal

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinians could reach a framework agreement by May, three months past the original deadline, Prime Minister Ehud Barak told the cabinet Sunday.

"I won't be shocked if we reach a framework agreement in May," Barak told the ministers.

The framework agreement was to have been reached last week, but negotiations stalled over the location of an interim withdrawal from the West Bank.

Barak said that he would reconsider the 6.1 percent of the West Bank that was supposed to be handed over to the Palestinians earlier this year, but insisted that in that round of territorial exchanges, no neighbourhoods near Jerusalem – a reference to Abu Dis – would be included.

Barak partly blamed the Palestinians for the delay, saying that they refused an offer to hold 20 days of intensive negotiations in January.

The Palestinians suspended talks earlier this month after they learned that Barak refused to give them three Arab suburbs of Jerusalem as part of an interim West Bank troop withdrawal.

The Palestinians say the framework agreement, which was Barak's idea, should be skipped in favour of direct negotiations over the treaty itself, due by September.

"We no longer need the framework agreement," Palestinian Speaker of Parliament Ahmed Qureia said in response to Barak's new target date. He blamed the deadlock on Israel's "impossible positions."

Meanwhile, German President Johannes Rau resisted being pulled into the dispute between Israel and the Palestinians, telling Palestinian lawmakers that he could not judge who was to blame for a deadlock in peace talks.

Rau, who visited Israel earlier, was hosted by senior Palestinian lawmakers, including Qureia.

Qureia made comments blaming Israel for the freeze in negotiations before Rau's speech.

"Please understand, I cannot judge why no agreement was reached," Rau said when his turn came to speak. "I am only a guest … It pains me that no agreement was reached," Rau said.

Qureia called on Europe to intervene in order to get the talks back on track. He said the Palestinians would declare statehood by September, with or without a treaty, and called on Europe and Germany to recognize the state.

Rau, who was on a five-day visit to the region, said Germany wants to see progress in the peace process, and would do all it could to help. "We won't sit in the background. We will support the process through aid," Rau said.

Teaching Israelis own history not a uniform matter

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — The history of Canada – its founding, its wars, its laws – is taught in schools throughout the country. Generally speaking, only one version of that history is taught. In Israel, however, this is not the case.

Women soldiers marching in 1948.

Here, variations of Israel's 52 years of existence are taught depending on which school one attends. At national religious and haredi schools, students learn about Israel's battles for independence – how despite being outnumbered, the Jews again and again overcame their enemy.

But state public school students have a different curriculum. Until last year, these students were learning the same history as their counterparts. That was before three highly publicized Grade 9 history books were introduced into the school system.

A New York Times article last August brought the contents of the history books into the media's spotlight. History professor Eyal Naveh, author of one of the books that came under attack, says there is criticism of the new books because "some people are not mature [enough] to face the change in historical research and they're not willing to incorporate these changes into the classroom.

"I think after 50 years people should be mature enough to face the not so nice parts of our existence. Everyone has some flaws but not everyone is able to engage in a critical dialogue of his past," Naveh said.

The "new historians," over the last decade or so, have been deconstructing some of Israel's most treasured founding stories, questioning the justness of Israeli actions back in 1948, and even the legitimacy of Israel itself. But when the scholarly debate suddenly seeped into the classrooms, people took notice.

The new textbooks suggest that Israel is responsible for the Palestinian refugee problem and that Israel, and not just the Arabs, is responsible for the 50-year-long Arab-Israel conflict.

The "new history" phenomenon represents a trend, said Shmuel Sandler, chair of Bar Ilan University's political science department. History, he noted, must always be a work in progress. The historical beliefs that Israelis grew up with should not be immune to examination or scholarly inquiry. But, Sandler says, this time the new historians have gone too far: "Once you break myths and don't replace them with new ones, society can disintegrate. This time it goes beyond revisionism."

Children of immigrants in 1949

The new history books for state schools "make plain that many of the most common Israeli beliefs are as much myth as fact," Ethan Bronner wrote in the New York Times on Aug. 14, 1999. Upon publication of the article, most of the editorials in Israel's papers attacked the "rewriters" of history. A Jerusalem Post editorial said: "In their zeal to debunk what may be over-simplifications of history, some new historians are introducing misleading pictures of their own."

Tel Aviv University's Naveh soon found himself in the spotlight of the controversy. Although he says he is not a new historian, because he authored one of the books he has been lumped together with them.

"I'm not an expert on Zionist history but on general history," Naveh told the Canadian Jewish News in a telephone interview. "I used some of their stuff. I appreciate what they've done. But I'm not a new historian."

Naveh said the passage about the War of Independence, which created much of the debate on the books, is quoted out of context.

In a 1984 Israeli textbook the war is described as such: "The numerical standoff between the two sides in the conflict was horrifyingly unbalanced. The Jewish community numbered 650,000. The Arab states together came to 40 million. The chances of success were doubtful and the Jewish community had to draft every possible fighter for the defence of the community."

In contrast, Naveh wrote of the same war: "On nearly every front and in nearly every battle, the Jewish side had the advantage over the Arabs in terms of planning, organization, operation of equipment, and also in the number of trained fighters who participated in the battle."

Naveh said this passage was taken from a chapter on the relationship between Jews and Arabs prior to the declaration of the state. "After the creation of the state and the invasion of the Arab forces, the situation changed – the new Israeli State faced numerous forces that outnumbered their ability."

"What I challenged was the few against the many – the myth of Goliath and David. If you take myth as reality then it's a problem," he added.

Naveh said he doesn't want the Israeli population to "engage in the illusion that when you're few you'll win," because when Israelis believed "this myth we had the catastrophe of the Yom Kippur War."

Still, Meir Pa'il, one of the most prominent new historians, noted that even if the newborn Israel was able to mobilize military equality in many battles against invading Arab armies, the reality was a Jewish presence stretched to its limits opposite outside nations with almost endless population reserves.

"My book is a Zionist book. Despite that I'm branded post-Zionist," Naveh said. "It's more sophisticated but it's geared to the Jewish Israeli populations."

The textbooks also teach that many Palestinian Arabs left their homes during the 1948 war out of fear, or because they were forced out by Israeli soldiers – not because they were sure of returning after an Arab military victory.

The changes are being justified by people "saying we're now in an era of peace – our history has to be written with a new spirit and this will be part of our reconciliation," Sandler said to the Canadian Jewish News in a recent interview from his office at BIU. "This would be okay if a parallel development existed. But if we look at Palestinian books, there's no parallel development."

Naveh said he believes there will be a change by the Arab side to correct myths and lies taught in its standard history books. "The old Palestinian history books – written by Egyptians and Jordanians – are terrible," he said. "But they're in the process of forming a committee to write their own books."

Naveh admitted that, at present, the Palestinians "look at history as a battle cry" and as long as they "have this approach it will not help the peace process." However, Naveh said, he is currently talking with Palestinian teachers and is helping them form a new curriculum which he hopes will "come in the direction of reconciliation."

At the time the books came into the spotlight, Zevulun Orlev, the National Religious Party chair of the Knesset Education Committee, said: "There is a great danger that they will inculcate students with post-Zionist attitudes, distort important national values and shatter heroic ideals which are vital to Jewish culture in Israel."

Canada helps marshall evidence in Kalejs case

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Two Canadian officials were in Latvia last week to present evidence in the ongoing case against alleged Nazi war criminal Konrads Kalejs.

They joined prosecutors from Britain, Israel, Australia and the United States to examine allegations that Kalejs was responsible for the murder of thousands of Jews, Gypsies and Communists during World War II.

Latvia hosted the meeting in the capital, Riga, to determine the extent of charges against Kalejs in the event the country asks for his extradition from Australia.

Terry Beitner, deputy director of the federal Department of Justice's War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity Unit, joined Joseph Rikhof of the Citizenship and Immigration Canada war crimes unit in Latvia for most of last week.

A spokesperson with the justice department declined to say what was scheduled for discussion with Latvian officials. She said only that Kalejs was the focus of the meeting.

Kalejs, now 86 and in poor health, is a native of Latvia but holds Australian citizenship. He was deported from Canada in 1997 for having lied about his wartime record.

A Canadian immigration adjudicator found credible evidence that Kalejs had been a high-ranking officer in the Nazi-affiliated Arajs Kommando – an auxiliary policy force – in Latvia, and had been a supervisor of guards at the Salaspils slave labor camp, where prisoners routinely succumbed to starvation, disease, torture and execution.

Vatican/PLO sign accord

While Vatican and Palestinian delegations were signing the agreement last week, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat met privately with Pope John Paul II, who is scheduled to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land next month.

They discussed Middle East issues and also agreed to add the West Bank town of Jericho to the papal itinerary. The Pope, who has already planned a stop at the Palestinian-ruled town of Bethlehem, also plans to visit sites in Israel and Jordan next month.

Most of the agreement touches on day-to-day bilateral issues, including the status of church institutions in Palestinian-ruled areas.

However, its preamble focuses mainly on Jerusalem. It says "an equitable solution for the issue of Jerusalem, based on international resolutions, is fundamental for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East."

It also says, "Unilateral decisions and actions altering the specific character and status of Jerusalem are morally and legally unacceptable."

And it calls for "a special statute for Jerusalem, internationally agreed" to safeguard "the proper identity and sacred character of the city and its universally significant religious and cultural heritage."

The Vatican has long maintained that Jerusalem should come under an international mandate as a holy city.

Mystery group meets Haider in Montreal

In another strange twist to the Haider visit, the Freedom Party posted an ingratiating letter bearing the name of the director of the Tash chassidic community on its Web site the week before the controversial Austrian politician's unannounced visit to Montreal.

The letter, dated Feb. 10, and over the name of Israel Lowen, "general administrator of the Tash Communities," states: "A visit of yours, Sir, to the Headquarters of our Communities in Montreal, where our Grand Rabbi is residing, will be as [sic] honour for us."

Lowen insisted that neither he nor "anyone else" in the Tash community, which lives in Boisbriand, about 60 kilometres north of Montreal, wrote that letter, nor was Haider invited to the wedding of the granddaughter of Tash Chief Rabbi F. Lowy, which took place last Wednesday in Boisbriand.

Lowen alleged that the letter was "a fabrication" and denied that the Avi Gasit-Muehlstein cited in the letter as Tash's "political consultant" represents the community in any way. Gasit-Muehlstein accompanied Haider during his time in Montreal.

Haider told The Gazette that in December, a month before the Austrian coalition government was formed, he had received an invitation to last week's wedding. He did not attend the wedding and Lowen said there was no meeting between Haider and any Tasher Jews.

Lowen's denial varies from Canadian Jewish Congress' version of events. Its Quebec Region chair, Dorothy Zalcman Howard, said Congress had received a copy of the letter by Feb. 11 and had communicated to the Tash community that day its "shock" and wish that Tash not have any contact with Haider.

She said Lowen had "stood by the letter," but agreed not to meet with Haider after Congress had explained its position.

CJC Quebec region executive-director David Birnbaum said Congress is confident the letter is authentic, no matter how "bizarre" it may seem.

"The Tash leadership was comfortable with the sentiments expressed (in the letter)... We are profoundly perplexed by their logic in seeking to align themselves with Haider. It is morally questionable."

The letter, posted in German and English, with the salutation, "Very esteemed Dr. Haider!" opens with congratulations, in the name of Rabbi Lowry, on Haider's 50th birthday.

The letter notes that the Tash community was founded by Holocaust survivors from Nir-Tash, Hungary, and has "deep Austro-Hungarian roots."

The letter denounces the "campaign of fear, hatred and defamation" being waged against Haider and Austria.

"We explicitly wish to express our protest regarding this campaign against you, Sir, and to state clearly that we are totally distancing ourselves from it. We are informed as well, Sir, that your political party has never supported anti-Semitic ideology, nor anti-democratic values."

It says the community accepts Haider's apology to Jews "regarding any misunderstanding of statements of yours in the far past" and wishes to "build a bridge of friendship, understanding and tolerance between our peoples."

The release of the letter so disturbed the London-based Conference of European Rabbis, which represents mainstream Orthodoxy, that it issued a statement "totally rejecting" the letter's sentiments. "We cannot fathom what prompted this small community" to "break ranks with Jewish people throughout the world..."

Ruth Klein, national director of B'nai Brith Canada's institute for international affairs, had a different take on the letter. "The whole thing was so bizarre, there couldn't be any truth to it," she said.

This is not the first time the Tash community, which has 2,500 to 3,000 members, according to Lowen, has aroused controversy. In 1995, it openly supported sovereignty in the referendum and warmly received Premier Jacques Parizeau in Boisbriand. Last year, its rabbinical college was at the centre of a Revenue Canada investigation of an alleged $60 million fraud.

Lowen said Gasit-Muehlstein is not a member of the Tash community, but lives north of Montreal and "pops in from time to time."

Lowen rejected speculation that the Tash community might have sought contact with Haider in the belief that he could press Austria to pay compensation to forced labourers during the Nazi regime.

"The religious rabbis have placed a ban on accepting any money from Germany," he said.

In other developments, Haider's request for a tour of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre at the Jewish Community Campus was turned down. Zalcman Howard said an "intermediary" had contacted the centre about a visit.

Centre executive-director Bill Surkis said the community refused to be "a tool in a propaganda machine."

The centre is currently showing an exhibition titled Children of the Holocaust: Legacy of a Vanished Generation. It is not known whether Haider realized that two young Austrians are currently working at the centre under a program which allows them to opt out of military service by serving at a Jewish community organization abroad.

Haider did visit the monument to Raoul Wallenberg in the courtyard behind Christ Church Cathedral, accompanied by Paul Lancz, the Hungarian-Jewish sculptor who created the bust.

Vera Parnes, president of the Canadian Friends of Raoul Wallenberg, said she was "astonished" and "insulted" by Haider's being at the monument, which is located on land accessible to the public.

She said neither her organization nor the Anglican church was aware that Haider was coming.

Also in Haider's entourage was Peter Sichrovsky, an Austrian-Jewish journalist, who represents the Freedom Party in the European parliament.

Haider's visit prompted three demonstrations. In Ottawa last Thursday, B'nai Brith organized a rally at the Austrian Embassy attended by about 150 people, including students from Hillel Academy, Yitzhak Rabin High School and Ottawa Torah Institute. In Toronto on the same day, anti-racists picketed outside the Austrian consulate. And last Sunday, a joint community rally was held in Toronto outside the Austrian Consulate. That rally was organized by Congress, B'nai Brith, the Canadian Zionist Federation and the Zionist Youth Movement in Canada.

Weight loss requires lifestyle change: experts

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Dr. Ronnie Aronson, founder of the Lifestyle Metabolism Centre, specializes in weight loss, but you won't find him pushing diets.

He says he and his colleagues at the multi-discipline clinic in Thornhill, endocrinologists Dr. Ronald Goldenberg and Dr. Robert Schlosser, promote lifestyle changes.

Aronson, who recently spoke to The CJN, stressed that changing lifestyle is not the same as following a diet.

He said following a diet is not a permanent solution to weight loss: "It will work in the short term, but once people stop the diet, the weight is usually regained."

He recommended a holistic or multi-discipline approach to weight loss, one that includes counselling, kinesiology and nutrition education, to effect a lifestyle change.

He said it's important to educate patients on structuring their time, planning meals, reading labels when they shop and ordering food in restaurants.

Counselling about the emotional problems related to overeating is an important component in a permanent weight loss program, he added.

The goal is to change the behaviour so that patients can avoid weight cycling or yo-yo dieting, Aronson said.

On average most of the patients he has seen in initial consultations have had eight to 12 weight cycles of 10 pounds or more in their past, he noted.

"It's astounding when you think about it. Some of our patients have had over 30 weight cycles in their lifetime, every year of their life losing 25 pounds or more and regaining it each time."

It can take at least a year to change behaviour, which Aronson said, is the ultimate goal of a sound weight loss program.

A change in behaviour, he explained is the route to permanent weight loss: many people can lose weight but keeping it off is the challenge.

Aronson said many of the commercial diet programs count fat grams. "Medically we know that these don't work in the long run.

"The same studies show that in long-term follow-up programs, the rate of weight regain is 100 percent by five years later."

He advocates a balanced diet, such as the one recommended in Canada's Food Guide, which he described as "a moderate approach."

He said by cutting 500 calories a day – for example, skipping the French fries or chocolate cake at lunch – one can save 3,500 calories a week, which translates into a weight loss of one pound of fat.

"Do this every day and the calories savings will add up overtime."

He said, the BMI (body mass index), the ratio of fat to body weight and height, is a medical standard for determining to what degree a person is overweight: people with a BMI of 25 are considered overweight, those with a BMI of 30 are considered obese.

He also measures a patient's metabolic rate – the rate the body burns calories – over a 24 hour period, he said, noting that many overweight people have slow metabolic rates.

He said when people lose weight, their metabolism actually slows down, which is why it's important to do aerobic exercise. "Exercise will burn some calories and the body will continue to burn extra calories later."

However, he said, aerobic exercise does not speed up one's metabolism. "The metabolic rate is determined by the quantity of muscles in the body. Weight training raises the metabolic rate."

A lot of people devote significant time to aerobic exercise – jogging, walking, swimming – but "it's more important to equally divide exercise time between aerobic activity as well as muscle-strengthening activity," Aronson said.

Epilepsy Awareness Month

TORONTO — Imagine having a health problem so stigmatized that your doctor doesn't always call it by name, so misunderstood that you don't want anyone to know you have it, so neglected that it's rarely discussed publicly.

"I used to be terrified to tell people about my seizures. But once I started to discuss it, I realized how many people secretly know someone with epilepsy," one person has said.

Welcome to life with epilepsy, a common neurological disorder shared by 350,000 Canadians. It may well be the 21st century, but epilepsy is still surrounded by the fear, ignorance and stigma of an earlier time. In fact even today, many people with epilepsy find other people's reactions harder to endure than the seizures themselves.

The international epilepsy community, with the support of the World Health Organization, is therefore launching the 2000 global campaign to bring epilepsy "out of the shadows."

For this purpose, March has been declared Epilepsy Awareness Month.

On March 1, "ambassadors for epilepsy" will be in the subways of Toronto handing out postcards calling on the prime minister of Canada to support this global initiative.

Throughout the month, the ambassadors will be speaking about living with a seizure disorder. They include children with epilepsy talking to their classes, seniors talking to their neighbours, teenagers hanging first aid posters, doctors talking to their colleagues, and adults speaking out at church, synagogue or temple. They are stepping forward to bring epilepsy out of the shadows into the light of community awareness and understanding.

It's not an easy step to take. Ask Sarah Jane Wilson, a 28-year-old Toronto television producer who overcame her fears to speak out about having epilepsy. Or Emma, at 11 the youngest ambassador for epilepsy. Or senior citizen Anna Dohler. Each one has a story to tell.

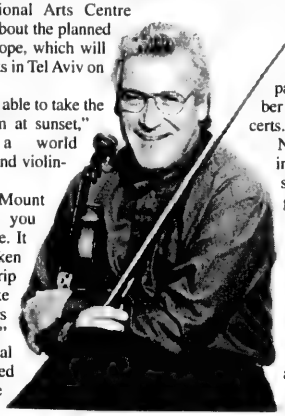
NAC Orchestra on tour

By DIANE KOVEN
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Pinchas Zukerman, the music director of the National Arts Centre Orchestra, is excited about the planned tour of Israel and Europe, which will begin with two concerts in Tel Aviv on Oct. 5 and 6.

"I would love to be able to take the orchestra to Jerusalem at sunset," says Zukerman, a world renowned conductor and violinist.

"After seeing Mount Scopus at sundown, you will never be the same. It changes you. I have taken many friends on that trip and I would love to take the orchestra members and tell them my story."



Pinchas Zukerman

Zukerman's musical genius was recognized early. In 1962, the teen-aged Tel Aviv native moved to New York to study at the Juilliard School of Music.

His parents followed in order to be close to their only child. However, life in America was difficult for them as they were unable to work.

In 1964, they moved to Montreal where they had a cousin, and Mrs. Zukerman, who received a Canadian passport, worked at the Jewish General Hospital.

They remained in Montreal for five years, but after Mr. Zukerman suffered a stroke, they returned to Israel.

The Canadian connection is strong and Zukerman enjoys discussing it. He reminisces about his first concert in Toronto, in 1966, for the Canada Israel Cultural Foundation and recalls that the MC for the event was Lorne Greene.

In just a short time since assuming the position of music director of the National Arts Centre Orchestra, Zukerman has made tremendous inroads in perking up the image of the 30-year-old Ottawa institution.

He has also started a summer teaching program that brings talented young musicians from across Canada, and abroad, to Ottawa to participate in master classes, chamber music rehearsals and concerts.

Now comfortably established in his home and NAC directorship, Zukerman still spends a great deal of time on the road. He travels extensively, maintaining a schedule that for most would be difficult to even imagine.

A hectic schedule of performing, conducting and teaching, has made Zukerman's presence felt across the country. He is currently leading the orchestra on an ambitious tour of the country.

Zukerman is determined to share his knowledge wherever he travels, and will use the tour to implement his teaching plans. In cities and towns across Canada, musical young people are being treated to a class, workshop or mini-concert by the maestro.

Zukerman professes to be apolitical, yet dreams of peace in the Middle East.

"I believe in the power of music," he says. He is hoping to arrange a concert in Amman, Jordan, the day after the orchestra performs in Tel Aviv.

"This concert is something I would feel incredibly proud to be a part of," he says. "My being an Israeli and being the music director of the NAC adds a flavour to it."

In the meantime, the Canadian tour continues. Zukerman and the NAC orchestra will be appearing in Toronto, at Roy Thompson Hall, on March 6.

If Cows Could Fly: a Jewish tale

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The once thriving Jewish communities of the Ottawa Valley, including Smiths Falls, Perth, Carleton Place and Almonte, are no more.

In his play If Cows Could Fly, about growing up Jewish in Smiths Falls, Allan Merovitz, 58, bemoans the loss of these communities.

"There were 15 Jewish families in Smiths Falls and Perth in the 1940s, but the children took the advice of their parents and left the towns to find their future elsewhere," said Merovitz, the musician and actor who performs with violinist Anne Lederman. The director is Ronald Weihs.

The play runs Feb. 16 to March 12 at the Artword Theatre, 75 Portland St., in the Bathurst-King area (416 408-2783).

Box office proceeds of the 7.30 p.m. show, Sunday, Feb. 27, are being donated to the Matti Baranovski Memorial Fund through Northview Heights Secondary School.

Merovitz' maternal grandfather, Velvel Waxman, was enticed to Smiths Falls after World War I by a landsman, Max Kessenbaum of Poland, who said the fresh air there would be good for his asthmatic condition.

His late father, Rubin, who was born in Joliette, Que., married Edith Waxman. The family operated two ladies' dress stores, one for larger women

"My father and his three brothers were all good hockey players, good enough to be with the Montreal Canadiens, but anti-Semitism got in the way," Merovitz said.

Hit by wanderlust at an early age, he left high school at Smiths Falls to work on a kibbutz in Israel, and then he became an assistant feeder at the zoo in London, England.

'Jewish' videos now on sale

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The cycle of life in the video business follows a carefully thought out circle, with each segment easily predictable and foreseeable. In most cases, videos are released in a particular sequence.

First of all, films are released theatrically and allowed to run their course, collecting as many box office dollars as possible. About six to eight months later, the film is released on video as a rental item. In other words, the studios don't expect individuals to purchase the video at this stage, because the price is high.

About six to 12 months after that, the video is re-released to the sell-through market – which means the casette can now be purchased for $20 to $30, and even less at certain large stores. And at various times over the next few years, the video is repackaged, repriced and re-released.

The Garden of the Finzi-Continis

Several "Jewish" films have recently been re-released or are about to be re-released and people who are building their own video collections will want to take advantage of these "sale" opportunities.

Lansky is an interesting film about the infamous Meir Lansky. Organized crime's money man, Lansky tried to immigrate to Israel at one time and was forced to return to the United States. Richard Dreyfus gives an excellent performance as the title character and this is one film that emphasizes the character's Jewishness, rather than ignoring it.

Eventually he returned to Canada, graduated in Ottawa as a teacher and taught for three years in nearby Ramsayville.

His theatrical career began in earnest after he graduated with a fine arts degree from Sir George Williams (now Concordia University) in Montreal.

But he never forgot the stories that his great-grandmother told him about life in Europe before she came to Canada.

"I'll never forget playing with the Flying Bugar Klezmer Band in Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories, when I heard some one call out in Yiddish. It turned out to be a Jewish man from Hay River who told me later that the whole Jewish community there went to Edmonton for the High Holy Days."

Merovitz said If Cows Could Fly is full of music that spans all of Canada, especially the brand of fiddle-playing indigenous to the Ottawa Valley.

"It's good entertainment for all families, whether Jewish or not," he said.

MEROVITZ PLAY DESCRIBES GROWING UP JEWISH IN SMITHS FALLS

Allan Merovitz, a noted klezmer musician and interpreter of Yiddish music, has crafted a play about growing up Jewish in Smiths Falls, Ont., a town in the Ottawa Valley.

Merovitz, who grew up in a family of chassidic Jews, takes about two hours to tell his family saga in If Cows Could Fly, a play he has been developing for nearly 15 years. Parts of it were staged previously as vignettes, including a segment called Zaide Doesn't Want to Be A Soldier.

Merovitz, the play's chief actor, is joined onstage by fiddler Anne Lederman. The production, which is directed by Ronald Weihs, offers a wide range of music, including Yiddish and klezmer songs, country and western, rock 'n' roll, and regional folk tunes.

The play runs until March 12. The Feb. 27 performance is being offered as a benefit on behalf of the Matti Baranovsky Memorial Fund. Artword Theatre, 75 Portland St. (one block east of Bathurst, south of King). Adults, $20. 416-408-2783.

Alan & Naomi is a sentimental film about a teenage girl who comes to the United States during World War II . Naomi is traumatized by the violence she witnessed in Nazi occupied Europe. Alan is an American teenager who tries to draw her out and to help her overcome the effects of the war.

The Garden of the Finzi-Continis has been around for a long time, but for people who have not seen this film or wish to add it to their collection, this is the time to do so. The film tells the story of a wealthy Jewish family in a small Italian town who refuse to believe they will be affected by the Nazis.

The Music Box is a moving film featuring Jessica Lang as a lawyer whose father is accused of being a war criminal. As the defence of her father progresses, she begins to doubt his innocence more and more. At the end, she is faced with both a moral and legal dilemma.

Steven Spielberg and the Shoah Foundation's film, The Last Days, is being released at a sell-through price. This carefully crafted documentary tells the story of how five Jews, now living in the United States, survived the German occupation of their Hungarian homeland.

And finally three videos in the Holocaust series, Rescuers: Stories of Courage, can now be purchased for under $12 a piece. These videos, which contain two stories each, are wonderful tales of gentiles who saved Jewish lives during the darkest days of the Holocaust. Each video is worth purchasing and adding to your own collection.

All of the videos above should be available at most video stores. If not, any video retailer can order them from his or her own distributor.

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

LOS ANGELES — Sunny days, a crystal blue ocean surrounded by mountains, historic sights, modern attractions, luxurious accommodations, fine dining, shopping galore, the ghosts of movie stars past and the chance sighting of movie stars present lure visitors from around the world to Southern California.

The region boasts of a number of quaint communities all offering unique vacation experiences.

Pasadena is located 15 minutes from downtown Los Angeles at the base of the San Gabriel Mountains. On Jan. 1, all eyes are on Pasadena's Tournament of Roses Parade, but the beauty of this city is evident throughout the year.

Sights include the trendy streets of Old Pasadena. The Huntington Library, art collections and spectacular botanical gardens and the internationally recognized masterpiece of the American Arts & Crafts movement – The Gamble House designed in 1908 for David and Mary Gamble of Proctor & Gamble.

Fine art lovers will appreciate the Norton Simon Museum of Art, showcasing collections from the Renaissance to the 20th Century. The walls are laden with art by Rembrandt, Renoir, Monet, Degas and Picasso.

Drive around suburban Pasadena and you will come across The Ritz-Carlton, Huntington Hotel & Spa. Breathtakingly beautiful, this landmark reflects the grandeur of Southern California's golden age. Upon request, meals from a kosher caterer can be served to guests who wish to dine at the hotel.

Approximately one hour south of Los Angeles lies Newport Beach. This is the home of Fashion Island, a shopper's paradise consisting of 200 stores and restaurants overlooking the Pacific Ocean. Fashion Island is conveniently located across the street from the Four Seasons Hotel Newport Beach – the hotel of choice for the elite visiting California's Riviera.

Minutes from Beverly Hills is the historic Santa Monica Pier with its famous carousel and fun arcade. Overlooking the pier is the Loews Santa Monica Beach Hotel – decorated in California chic with giant palm trees in its atrium lobby. The Pritikin Longevity Center & Spa is located in the hotel and guests can partake of the exercise room and health lectures free of charge.

A turn-of-the-century kitchen at the Skirball Cultural Centre.

A trip to Santa Monica's Museum of Flying is a must for airplane buffs. There are over 40 vintage aircraft, many still in flight-ready condition.

The Skirball Cultural Center, located on a picturesque 15-acre site in the Santa Monica Mountains, seeks to interpret the Jewish experience and to strengthen American society through cultural programs including exhibitions, lectures, performances, readings, film and video-screenings for all ages and backgrounds. Zeidler's at Skirball offers delicious kosher meals.

Stars are everywhere at the Four Seasons Hotel Los Angeles at Beverly Hills. Before breakfast one midweek morning I spotted Sigourney Weaver, William Baldwin and composer Marvin Hamlisch. Located in a residential neighbourhood, the Four Seasons caters to every whim of the well-heeled clientele.

A full range of equipment and cutlery for kosher food is available through room service. Kosher food can also be ordered in.

Travel in style to Rodeo Drive by taking advantage of the Four Seasons' complimentary car shuttle service. At the Hollywood Entertainment Museum, you can sit in the spaceship chair used by Captain Kirk in Star Trek, among other things.

Steps away from the museum is the Hollywood Walk of Fame and Mann's Chinese Theater. Paramount Studios, the only working studio still located in Hollywood, offers two hour walking tours.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center Museum of Tolerance is a world-class complex designed to challenge visitors to confront racism and try and comprehend the Holocaust. All of Los Angeles' law enforcement officers are mandated to visit the centre's exhibits.

For more information contact the Convention and Visitors Bureau for Los Angeles at 213-624-7300, Pasadena 626-795-9311 and Newport Beach 1-800-94COAST or 929-722-1611.

Richmond Hill teen high school all-star

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At six-foot-six, 185 lbs., Josh Binstock has the right stuff to be a volleyball star.

He can leap into the air to block an opponent's spike right at the net. He's blessed with tremendous athleticism, giving him the ability to return spikes, set up teammates and maneuver in the back court. Combine that with his "great concentration level," and George Shermer says he would gladly include him as part of any Canadian volleyball team at the Maccabiah Games. Binstock, he points out, was selected to play with the Provincial Under-18 team and participated in the National Team Challenge Cup.

Binstock, 19, is as eager to wear Canada's colours at the Maccabiah games as Shermer is to recruit him. He's never been to the Jewish state and he figures volleyball would give him the perfect opportunity to visit.

In the meantime, he's keeping his local travel calendar pretty full, as he attends volleyball tournaments throughout the Golden Horseshoe as a member of the JCC Blues.

The team has missed winning tournament medals only twice in the last two years and some prognosticators ranked the team number one at the start of the season, he said.

At the last tournament he attended, the team was undefeated until Daniel Shermer, George's 17-year-old son, hurt his back. As the team's "setter," the player who sets up his teammates for a spike, Shermer was the key man in the front court. When he went down, the team went with him, but "when we have our whole team, we're unstoppable," Binstock said.

A member of the Toronto Star's high school volleyball "dream team," Binstock led the Richmond Hill Raiders to a 33-6 season and a third place finish in the provincial championships in November.

During the rest of the season, he plays for the Blues, a club team that plays a much higher-calibre brand of ball.

He and Daniel Shermer are the only two Jewish strikers on the team, which includes a multicultural mix of players. The Blues' main rival is Forest City, a London team that appears to be on the way down while the Blues pass them on the way up.

"We hate each other," Binstock said matter-of-factly. "Both our programs are really strong."

An A student in Grade 13, Binstock expects he'll be seeing plenty of tournament playoff action later this year. The Blues have a good chance of advancing to the final pair in the provincial championships in the spring. Last year, he pointed out, the team qualified for the national finals as a third Ontario team, but couldn't afford the cost of travelling to Vancouver for the tournament.

If he had to chose between the two volleyball games, Binstock leans towards the beach variety. Because two guys have to cover the same area as a six-man team, "it requires more endurance. You're always touching the ball... I like beach. You have control over your destiny."

There are added bonuses: "The atmosphere is relaxing in the sun. And of course, the girls..."

Binstock plans to try out this summer for Ontario's junior beach volleyball team.

Volleyball renaissance sought

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — George Shermer's glory days on the hardcourt took place 25 years ago, but to him, it seems like yesterday.

Wasn't it yesterday that he was a key member of the Bathurst JCC's nationally-ranked volleyball team, the one that often represented Ontario in national championships?

And wasn't it yesterday that he and Eddie Bien, a member of the 1967 Pan American Games team, were invited to play for Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel?

Actually it was 1973, a time when Afros and bell-bottoms were in style, the Habs had a good hockey team and Maccabi Canada for the first time sent a volleyball team to the Maccabiah games in Israel. Though a talented group, they were green and they only managed a fifth place finish that year. Four years later, they dropped to sixth.

In 1981, in what Shermer believes would have been their breakthrough year, Maccabi Canada pulled the plug on the team and since then, Canada has watched Maccabiah volleyball action from the sidelines.

Shermer, the principal shareholder of Beach Blast, an indoor volleyball facility in Toronto, believes it's time Maccabi Canada sent another volleyball team to Israel. Maccabi Canada agrees. Paul Wise, the organization's Ontario chair, said the sports group is keen on sending as many good young athletes to Israel as possible – including volleyball players. There's a good chance volleyball will be among the teams wearing Canadian colours at the next games.

Even though he retired from competitive volleyball in 1985, Shermer has stayed close to the game and he can identify the best young Jewish athletes. Based on what he's seen, he believes there's enough talent to field a competitive Maccabiah team and rekindle a long lost tradition.

Back in 1992 when he and his wife Enne (Angie) ran the sports equipment shop at the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) on Bathurst, he got permission to put together a club team of 14 and 15 year-old boys. The JCC Blues were born and were soon a competitive collection of athletes in provincial-level tournaments. They consistently placed in the top three or four in tournament play and have won two gold medals at the Junior Maccabi Games in the last three years. Now, with most of those athletes in their late teens and early 20s, the time is ripe to assemble a Maccabiah-calibre team, he said.

Shermer, who was first exposed to volleyball as a teenager in his native Czechoslovakia, points to star players Josh Binstock, Josh Greenberg, Josh Glaskin (the Joshes), Eli Shermer (his son) and Lucienne Vital as the nucleus of a national Maccabi team.

Alternatively, any of the players could get together as a beach volleyball team, he said.

Surveying the Jewish volleyball scene, Shermer said the BJC Blues junior boys team, which finished third in Ontario last year, was ranked prior to the season as the number one contender to win the provincial championships. As a club team playing out of the BJC, the girls have continued to do well but he doesn't believe there's enough talent on that team alone to form a hardcourt team for the upcoming games.

If it was strictly up to Shermer, who will coach one of the Maccabiah teams, "I'd send a hardcourt team" over a beach team. "My experience is that it had a much greater impact on me because it's a team sport. It made me a better person."

"Beach volleyball," Shermer conceded, "Is getting tremendous exposure and so, a lot of younger athletes are trying it out and finding it's a lot of fun." He sees it as an entry into the hardcourt game and it has resulted in a corresponding growth in popularity for indoor volleyball.

Shermer is on the prowl for talented volleyball players across Canada interested in trying out for a Maccabiah team. He can be reached in Toronto at 416-785-6677.

Looking ahead to Y6K

By JORDAN MAX

An Abbreviated Guide to Jewish History, Part 1, Year 0-1656 (3370-2104 BCE)

With the Y2K hysteria now mercifully behind us, I thought the time was safe to begin discussing our Y6K celebrations in 240 years. While I have not been asked for my contribution, here anyway is my take on Jewish History. Let us begin:

Year 0 (3760 BCE) – Historians unanimously agree that without the start of time as we know it, there would be no history, and therefore no need for historians. The creation of the universe (with the exception of parts of New Jersey and south Florida) was a "grand opening"-type event, without so much as a door prize or press coverage.

In only six days, by working through coffee breaks and lunch, God creates the heavens, the earth, water, planets, plants and vegetables (including broccoli and brussel sprouts, but hey, no one's perfect), animals and of course, man and woman, after which He makes a cholent and takes a long nap.

Most historians agree that this was an important year in Jewish history, although many dispute that Adam and Eve were specifically Jewish, notwithstanding their affinity for eating and wearing shmattes with floral patterns. Bible scholars cite Chapter 2 of Bereshit as further evidence of Adam's Jewishness, since Eve was literally on his back from the start.

Naturally, man and woman rebel against the one thing they're not supposed to do, and are banished from Gan Eden (though not from the piano lounge), and are punished with having to do physical labour for daily sustenance (excluding software programmers) and pain during childbirth.

Their children, Cain and Abel, get into the first argument, and Cain kills Abel. Cain is punished by being forced to wander the earth as a lounge singer in search of a decent kosher restaurant with good food, good service and reasonable prices.

Adam and Eve's descendants begin to multiply, followed by subtracting and dividing, and manage to live hundreds of years in retirement in warm climates.

However, too much retirement with way too much time on their hands before dinner leads to moral corruption and the invention of card games. Or maybe it's the other way around.

Last Laugh

Things begin to get out of hand, until – 1063 (2697 BCE) – Chinese people come into existence, including invention of Chinese food, or as the Chinese people call it, food. All civilizations adopt the custom of eating Chinese food on Sunday night.

Cheque-splitting becomes a common practice, leading to the need for accountants, tax loopholes and even more corruption, until – 1656 (2104 BCE).

God isn't happy about how the project is heading, and decides to "right-size" and "re-engineer" the world. He tells Noah "the Meshuga" to build a boat without any engine. Noah survives the big flood along with his family and two of each animal, including unfortunately, mosquitoes. God promises never again to destroy the world, although he does reserve the right to send natural disasters such as earthquakes, hurricanes, volcano eruptions, monsoons and television talk shows every now and then, to remind people who's really the boss.

Noah invents wine, drinks maybe two or three ounces of wine and passes out. His sons go into the insurance business, and invent the Act of God clause. Competition in the insurance business leads to different gods in the Act of God clause, and polytheism, that is, until – to be continued

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I belong to a hockey club and play three times a week. My best friend Alex and I always go together, and our moms take turns driving us. Last week, Alex got into a terrible fight and said some things he shouldn't have. The coach threw him off the team and won't let him back for the rest of the season.

Alex is going to join another club now, and I want to go to the club he is going to. My mom said I have to finish off the season where I started and that it isn't fair to let down my teammates. I really don't care about the other guys on the team. I want to hang out with Alex. Can you give me a suggestion that I can tell my mom so she will let me change teams?

Hockey Player

Dear Hockey Player,

As much as you would like to continue to play hockey with Alex, it is not fair to abandon your present team. Hockey is a group sport, and every player's participation is important. Your teammates are counting on you for your skills and ability. They will be disappointed if you leave them for another club.

There are other things that you and Alex can do together. You can play street hockey games on the weekends with a bunch of kids. There are different clubs and sports that you can both participate in.

Your mother is right. You should not consider changing teams because you must realize the effect you will have on others around you.

It is a shame that you and Alex can no longer play on this team, but I assure you, you will have another opportunity. The season will soon be over, and next year, you and Alex will be able to play on the same team again. Although you are disappointed that you can not play with your best friend, in this situation you have to put your needs aside and see that ultimately your teammates will be let down.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 12 in Toronto.

Lebanon pullout on Israel's agenda

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Faced with increasing public pressure for an Israeli troop withdrawal from southern Lebanon, Israel's cabinet has convened to debate whether and how to make the move.

Cabinet secretary, Yitzhak Herzog, said the purpose of Sunday's session was to "get a comprehensive characterization" of the situation, not necessarily to take any decisive steps.

Cabinet ponders move

Cabinet member Haim Ramon, who is considered close to Prime Minister Ehud Barak, was quoted as saying before the meeting, "I hope that the outcome" will be that Israel "will not remain in Lebanon later than July."

As the session took place, Hezbollah bombarded Israeli outposts in southern Lebanon.

Barak has vowed to withdraw the Israel Defence Force from southern Lebanon by July, but has hoped to do so in the context of a peace agreement with Syria, the leading power in Lebanon.

But with Israeli-Syrian talks now suspended, observers have suggested that chances of reaching an accord by then are dwindling.

Barak has hinted that a unilateral withdrawal is not out of the question.

However, he is concerned that it might result in more casualties than a withdrawal carried out as part of an agreement with Syria.

Recent Hezbollah attacks that killed seven Israeli soldiers have resulted in stepped up public pressure for a withdrawal from the security zone, which Israel maintains as a buffer from cross-border Hezbollah rocket attacks on northern Israeli communities.

Meanwhile, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported Sunday that Iran has transferred to Lebanon rockets with a longer range than those used previously by Hezbollah.

The report said the latest rockets could possibly reach as far south as Haifa.

According to the paper, the weapons have not yet been transferred to Hezbollah and are being held by Iranian sources in Lebanon. Israel has informed the United States of the developments, the paper said.

At Sunday's cabinet meeting, Barak reportedly briefed his ministers on the positions previous governments have taken regarding the Golan Heights, which Syria demands that Israel return as part of a peace accord.

Syria may renew talks

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syria has indicated that it might be willing to renew the peace talks, the U.S. administration informed Israel last weekend.

Syrian willingness to negotiate would depend on a formula according to which, in return for an Israeli agreement to demarcate the June 4, 1967 lines as the border between the countries, the Syrians would clarify their positions on normalization and security arrangements.

According to a diplomatic source in Jerusalem, the Americans reported that the Syrians had hinted that they were ready to make progress on the Lebanon issue, which in recent weeks, has been the prime obstacle to restarting the talks. The political level has not received corroboration of the American report from other sources.

Washington has been working to get the Israeli-Syrian talks back on track, based on the evaluation of Secretary of State Madeleine Albright that only another "eight weeks of a last opportunity" remain to achieve a settlement before the Bill Clinton administration's term winds down.

The News in Brief

Canada

Seeks Wallenberg Day

OTTAWA — Clifford Lincoln, member of Parliament for Lac-Saint-Louis and chair of the House of Commons standing committee on Canadian heritage, has introduced a private member's bill to designate Jan. 17 as Raoul Wallenberg Day. The bill follows up on a parliamentary resolution in 1985, declaring Raoul Wallenberg an honorary citizen of Canada. It aims to further recognize the humanitarian who, at enormous personal risk, saved the lives of about 100,000 Hungarian Jews from the Holocaust.

Honorary Degree

TORONTO — The Law Society of Upper Canada recently awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree to Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut in recognition of his advocacy for human rights. He received the award during the call to the bar ceremonies.

Israel

Papal Visit Not Green

JERUSALEM — Israel's preparations for a papal pilgrimage are destroying an area in the Galilee, Israeli environmentalists have charged. They said dozens of bulldozers are ripping up a mountain to construct a parking lot for pilgrims, and a large amphitheatre where Pope John Paul II will conduct mass during his visit later this month.

Project Begins

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinian Authority recently broke ground for a joint industrial zone in the northern West Bank town of Jenin. The industrial zone is the second such project between the two sides.

Aliyah Down

JERUSALEM — The number of people immigrating to Israel from western nations declined last year, according to the Jerusalem Post. Aliyah from the United States is at its lowest point since 1968, the paper quoted an official from the Jewish Agency for Israel as saying.

Israel To State View

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak is sending his top adviser abroad to present the government position in face of Palestinian accusations blaming Israel for the stalled peace talks. Danny Yatom is to hold talks with European Union officials in Brussels and Russian officials in Moscow.

World

Seek U.S. Citizenship

NEW YORK — Some 2,000 Jews who fled Syria in the 1980s have not been able to obtain U.S. citizenship because of a technicality, according to a Sephardi rights group. Noting that the refugees came to the United States on tourist visas because that was the only way Syrian President Hafez al-Assad would allow them to leave, the Sephardic Voters League called on the U.S. Congress to pass a bill that would grant them citizenship.

Zhirinovsky can't run

MOSCOW — Russia's central election commission refused to allow ultra-nationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky to register for the country's upcoming presidential elections. The move, based on Zhirinovsky's failure to list a two-room apartment in his property declaration, is seen as another attempt to increase the chances of acting President Vladimir Putin's victory in the March 26 elections.

Publisher Dies

NEW YORK — Heinrich Ungar, the publisher of the Swiss weekly Judischer Rundschau, or Jewish Review, died recently after a long illness, according to his newspaper. He was 79. Ungar escaped from Austria two months after the Nazis took control of the country in 1938. He began working for the paper, then called Maccabi, after the war.

Site Proposed

DAMASCUS — Syria suggested to Israel that they set up a site on the Golan Heights where Druze from opposite sides of the border will be able to meet and talk. Until now, the villagers have had to shout across the cease-fire line from a distance of hundreds of yards.

Marchers Protest

BEIRUT — Thousands of Lebanese and members of Hezbollah marched here to protest U.S. support for Israel, following weeks of confrontations between Hezbollah gunmen and Israeli soldiers in southern Lebanon. Protesters chanted anti-U.S. slogans and carried banners condemning the United States and Israel.

Danger Posed

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The leading pro-Israel lobby in the United States applauded the Senate for unanimously passing a bill singling out Russia for possible sanctions if it supplies Iran with weapons of mass destruction. The vote "clearly demonstrates that Congress understands the serious dangers posed to both Israel and the United States by the unchecked flow of technology transfers," the American Israel Public Affairs Committee said in a statement.

Jewish Teen Killed

TORONTO — Alexander (Sasha) Kalaba, 17, was fatally stabbed Feb. 18 in a parking lot near Etobicoke's Silverthorn Collegiate Institute, where he was a Grade 12 student. An alumnus of the Hebrew school at Solel Congregation in Mississauga, Kalaba was a nice kid with many friends, his mother, Irma Kacur, told The CJN.

Kalaba, a native of Toronto whose parents had immigrated from Bosnia, was good with his hands and had a sense of humour that often had his family "laughing [their] heads off," she said. Kalaba leaves his mother, his father Tomo Kalaba and a sister, Esther.

The incident, said Detective Ray Zarb, was "an argument that escalated." Police have charged Sean Browne, 20, with first-degree murder and have issued a warrant for the arrest of Alas Warsame and Mohamed Guled, both 19. Anyone having information is asked to call Crime Stoppers at 416-222-8477.

Rabbi Marmur responds to premier on poverty issue

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Dow Marmur, spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple, has a question for Premier Mike Harris.

If things are so good, why are they so bad?

Rabbi Marmur was speaking to The CJN about a letter sent to him by Harris, after the rabbi wrote Harris an open letter about poverty in the city.

Harris addressed the rabbi's plea for more government involvement in dealing with poverty. "Our government believes a vibrant economy with strong job growth and employment earnings is the best response to poverty…

"Over 462,000 people have stopped relying on welfare since this government was elected, and our economic policies have helped fuel the creation of over 600,000 new jobs in Ontario since June 1995…

"We have developed a provincial homelessness strategy and announced a number of new initiatives to help address the immediate and long-term needs of people who are homeless or at risk of becoming homeless…

"I appreciate the work that you and the members of your congregation are doing to help our fellow Ontarians. Poverty is a complex issue that requires a positive partnership between all three levels of government, the private sector, community organizations and representatives of Ontario's faith communities."

Rabbi Marmur said he would like to know, if all these steps have been taken, "why are there so many more homeless people in the streets of Toronto nowadays, and why are the food banks busier than ever?

"I'm not in a position to question the data in the premier's reply. In my letter to him I spoke of the difficulties people like myself have in reviewing statistics. All my colleagues and I have, is experience from the grassroots, and it does not respond to what I read in the letter."

What he is seeing in Harris' reply, Rabbi Marmur said, is "political rhetoric, and expediency versus human predicament. A reiteration of government

Students in stabbing incident at CHAT released on bail

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto who are charged with aggravated assault in the stabbing of another teenager, have been released on bail in the custody of their parents. Bail was set at $15,000 each.

A publication ban has been ordered on all evidence presented in court. As well, due to provisions of the Young Offenders Act, the youngsters, age 16 and 17, can not be identified.

The victim, age 17, was not seriously hurt, and is home from the hospital. His family has requested that his name not be released.

Bail conditions are stringent. The boys, who are brothers, are not allowed outside the four walls of their home, unless they are accompanied by a parent or certain designated family members.

If they are allowed back to CHAT, or if they go to another school, they must be driven to and from the school and remain within the confines of the building.

They are not allowed to have any contact with witnesses, to use drugs nor to possess weapons.

CHAT has been offering guidance sessions with students. The school also held assemblies for the students and a meeting with the parent body.

Headmaster Paul Shaviv told The CJN that he and his staff have no further comments at this time.

The police investigation is continuing. Next court date for the accused is April 12.

Erudition and innocence

From the editor's desk

Across my desk, I recently received the text of the address delivered by Irwin Cotler at the international forum, Holocaust Education, Research and Remembrance, six weeks ago in Stockholm.

The recently elected member of parliament for Mount Royal joined Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray at the head of the Canadian delegation. The meeting brought together experts from 46 countries, for discussions, workshops and presentations on how to teach and how to commemorate the Holocaust.

True to the form for which the law professor, human rights advocate and now elected public servant has become famous, Cotler's remarks were the intellectual and emotional equivalent of a punch to the solar plexus.

Reading them in the relative calm of my study, I was left breathless. I can only imagine how the audience must have responded to Cotler's insistent, forceful presentation. I can only imagine, too, how the simultaneous translators, if there were any, must have struggled to keep up, gasping for air with the MP's torrid, tenacious delivery, and with his respite-denying depth of content.

Cotler noted that the conference took place at "a historic moment of remembrance and reminder, of witness and warning...in the wake of, and on the occasion of four historic moral/juridical initiatives that emerged from the ashes of the Holocaust: the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; the Genocide Convention; the Geneva Conventions; and the 50th anniversary of the codification of the 'Nuremberg Principles' by the United Nations General Assembly".

The purpose of his remarks was to summarize some of the existential lessons of the Holocaust (my emphasis). He cited 13! Space does not permit any elaboration of these lessons. The full text of his remarks ran to 11 pages single-spaced. I shall only repeat them, paraphrased, in the order Cotler listed them.

- The teaching of contempt for the other and the resultant demonizing of the other helped pave the road to genocide.
- Indifference and silence worked to Nazis' advantage.
- The weak and vulnerable of society were the first group targeted for killing.
- The empowered elite of society must be held accountable.
- One must guard against the misappropriation of Holocaust metaphors.
- One must struggle against racism of all kinds.
- The mass theft of the victims' property amounted to "thefticide."
- It is our responsibility to expose and unmask the Holocaust deniers.
- War criminals must be brought to justice.
- Human beings have the right to remember and to be remembered.
- Children's rights must be at the core of who we are.
- Women's rights must be a priority on the justice agenda.
- Because it is possible to resist evil, each one of us has a role to play.

Cotler's speech is truly a marvel.

To provide what I would call a poignant punctuation and a fitting annotation to Cotler's breathtaking, incisive erudition, I reproduce the innocently penetrating insight of Stephanie Ouanounou, a Grade 5 student at Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto. Her essay was sent to me by her principal Rosalie Sniderman. It's called Sheineh Ponim: That's Me.

"I am a ten year old girl, with a round face, short brown hair, huge brown eyes, long curled eyelashes, a really small nose and pretty pink lips. My bubbie and zaidy always call me a 'Sheineh Ponim.'

"I grew up hearing those words all my life. My mom told me 'Sheineh Ponim' means pretty face. I thought I was so special. But, I soon found out that my brother was also a 'Sheineh Ponim' and so was my sister. I thought I was the only 'Sheineh Ponim!' Well, that's okay, all the people in my family have pretty faces.

"Then I went to my friend's house and her bubbie was there. She said to my friend, 'Oh, you're such a a sheineh ponim.' I realized that all bubbies and zaidys call their grandchildren 'Sheineh Ponim.' I didn't think I was so special anymore.

"My mom explained to me that children and grandchildren are the most precious things in the whole wide world. I thought about that. I know my grandparents are survivors of the Holocaust and they are lucky enough to have survived. My grandparents have two children and eight grandchildren. Others were not so lucky.

"I figured something out. All Jewish grandchildren have a 'Sheineh Ponim,' because all Jewish grandchildren are special. JUST LIKE ME!"

The erudition of the professor and the innocence of the Grade 5 student fit so perfectly together, conveying unmistakably, like a shadow at noon, the lessons of the Holocaust. MBD

More hate crimes reported in 1999: police

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Majority of religion-based incidents anti-Semitic

TORONTO — Hate-motivated crimes reported to Toronto Police Services have increased 28 percent in 1999, from 228 offences in 1998 to 292 in 1999, according to the police Hate Crime Unit year-end statistical report released last week.

Thirty-eight incidents (13 percent) fell into the category of religion (compared to 32 incidents in 1998). The majority of the religion-related incidents are anti-Semitic, and have been since the police began publishing these statistics in 1993.

The rise in reported hate crimes probably has to do with the police and public being "more aware of what constitutes a hate crime, and that's a positive," said Danny Roth, public affairs and communications director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

"The hate crime unit continues to do a good job in working to bring the problems in Toronto to the fore," said Amelia Golden of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights. Golden lauded the police for now having hate crime co-ordinators within individual divisions, facilitating the recognition of hate crimes.

The report itself emphasized that the data do "not accurately represent the prevalence of hate bias crime. Historically, there has been a reluctance by some members of the public to report their victimization to police."

The largest proportion of offences (38 percent) were race related, as in previous years. Other categories included multi-bias (22 percent), sexual orientation (15 percent), nationality (7 percent), ethnicity (2 percent), gender (1 percent) and disability (1 percent).

Most of the incidents occurred in public places. The commonest offences were mischief (including graffiti) and assaults, usually unprovoked.

The perpetrators, in most cases, were described as males between 26 and 40 years old. In 1998, younger males (ages 18 to 25) were the prime suspects.

Hate groups and individual hate mongers were mainly responsible for the distribution of hate literature, voice messages and e-mails, according to the report.

Twenty-nine wilful promotion of hatred offences were committed by people who identified themselves as members of the Ku Klux Klan, Original Canadian White Bloor Boys, the Union Committee, the Movement to Restore Decencies, and the Coalition for a Humanistic British Canada.

Forty-nine of the cases in 1999 resulted in charges. Of those, 29 remain before the courts.

Darchei Noam to build affordable housing

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Darchei Noam, Toronto's only Reconstructionist synagogue, is extending its involvement in the Out of the Cold program: the synagogue will help build affordable housing for those who have known life on the street.

Out of the Cold, which feeds and houses the homeless, and Darchei Noam have partnered with the City of Toronto to build a 24-unit, three-storey affordable housing project at 647 Lawrence Ave. W., near the Allen Expressway.

Plans call for Trellis Gardens, as the project is to be named, to include a communal garden and a play area for children and it will offer programs on child care, job searching, and parenting.

About 17 of the units will be designated for women and their children living in shelters, hostels and temporary motel rooms. Rent for the units will be no greater than what welfare allots for shelter.

Rent for the other seven units will be geared to market value.

"It's social action in action," says Val Hyman, chair of Darchei Noam's social action committee. "We see the homeless every week. We see how dreadful the problem is."

Darchei Noam is now in its third year of involvement in Out of the Cold, a coalition of 50 or so churches and one synagogue which take in the homeless one night a week. Darchei Noam is partnered with St. Peter's Church at Bathurst and Bloor, where the homeless go each Thursday night for a meal and a place to sleep. Darchei Noam has provided as many as 75 volunteers for the effort.

As Hyman sees it, building affordable housing for the homeless is a logical extension of the synagogue's activity.

Out of the Cold and Darchei Noam are the first beneficiaries of Toronto's Let's Build program, which hopes to erect hundreds of affordable housing units in the city.

A year ago, the city approached Out of the Cold, which joined with Darchei Noam to form Trellis Housing Initiative, a legal entity. The city owns the half-acre site on Lawrence West, and will lease it to Trellis at a nominal rate.

As well, the city will provide a capital grant of $240,000 and an interest-free second mortgage of $600,000. It will also waive all planning charges and fees.

But the tough part is still ahead: Out of the Cold and Darchei Noam must raise at least $360,000 on their own within the next six months.

Hyman says the synagogue will turn to the Jewish community for individual and corporate donations. She adds that Trellis is hoping to break ground this fall.

Darchei Noam is no stranger to this kind of social action. A few years ago, it opened Moshav Noam, a 133-unit co-operative housing project, also on Lawrence Avenue West.

Ve'ahavta encourages homeless to write

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta, the Jewish humanitarian organization, has provided thousands of sandwiches, hot drinks, blankets and socks to Toronto's homeless population since it teamed up with Na-Me-Res, the native men's residence, to assist the latter in its Street Help program.

But recently, Ve'ahavta offered a different kind of sustenance, in the form of a creative writing contest for homeless people. "We always felt it's a very good idea to help people develop their soul, their individuality," said Avrum Rosensweig, executive vice-president of Ve'ahavta. "We know there are a lot of creative people on the street."

In November, the organization, in partnership with Na-Me-Res, distributed 500 contest application kits, each including a pen and a pad of paper.

Each applicant received a book from Indigo Books, as well as the opportunity to participate in a day-long creative writing workshop at Ryerson Polytechnic University (donated by Ryerson specifically for the homeless participants). The three top prizes were $500, $350 and $150, donated by Kernels Popcorn, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue and Na Me Res, respectively.

The 14 submissions, which included fiction and non-fiction, contained some "very poignant stuff," said Rosensweig.

He and Rachel Lasry, Ve'ahavta's program director, have read some of the submissions before a variety of school and synagogue groups. They recently visited the Grade 6 class at the Toronto Heschel School, at teacher Ellen Kessler's invitation, to conduct a workshop about the homeless with her students.

The Ve'ahavta session tied into a unit on homelessness the class was doing as part of their tikkun olam program; they also took a field trip to a homeless shelter, Kessler said.

"I am a person – bereft of voice, stripped of pride," Martin's essay began. Writing in a tidy, roundish vertical script, the 35-year-old homeless woman described her isolation, sadness and lack of value in society. "I'm eroded in my mind, body and soul…I pray desperately but in vain."

The students wrote back to Martin, to share their feelings on hearing her story and to encourage her to continue writing.

Child poverty a reality in Canada, students told

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Leo Baeck Day School students were presented with a challenge at their learn-in on child poverty.

They were asked to take their imaginations and put them away; this is a day for reality, they were told.

They were also asked to always keep in mind that although child poverty may not be obvious in Canada, it definitely exists.

Students Sara Josse and Ongi Mader with Suan Jackson of UJA Federation.

"We're not a developing country; child poverty is hidden. You should always be conscious of it, however, and support the efforts of those trying to end it," said Laurel Rothman from Campaign 2000, the campaign to fight child poverty in Canada.

Other speakers at the learn-in included Lillian Paragoe, a minister of the Lawrence Park United Church; Debbie Feldman, a social worker from Jewish Child & Family Service; Eli Ophir from UJA Federation, Caroline DiGiovanni executive director of Catholic Children's Aid's Hope for Children Foundation, and Susan Jackson of UJA Federation.

Zita Gardner, director of Leo Baeck, said that the annual learn-in is intended to make students aware that their "learning has life meaning. We try to bring in people who participate in making the world a better place."

The students also take part in activities revolved around the learn-in. They have made placemats for Holy Blossom's Out of the Cold program, and some students have raised money for organizations of their choice. This year, their goal is to raise money in order to buy computers for an Ethiopian absorption centre in Israel, said Gardner.

Susan Jackson, the keynote speaker, said that in this country, we supposedly have the best life, but there are children who wake up with nothing to eat. "I was at an inner city school, and a student asked me for some bread that I was about to throw out. It hit me for the first time, that we are not talking about people on television; we are talking about living, breathing people."

A student at the same school told Jackson that her parents had to choose between paying rent and feeding the family. "They paid the rent, and then went to a food bank."

She asked the students to try and find a common denominator between these kids and themselves. "These things could have happened to us if things had turned another way," she said.

At one session, Rothman told the students that the UN sees Canada as the number one place to live with regards to healthcare, schools and safe communities. "They do not look at poverty, however. When stacked against the other industrial countries, Canada only ranks about seventh. We still have a long way to go."

The government has the responsibility to follow through on its 1989 resolution to end child poverty by 2000, she said.

Moving beyond poverty is quite difficult, she acknowledged. "Sometimes it is a struggle to finish high school because kids are needed to help support the family. Lots of kids from lower income families cannot do what is necessary to plan for a career. This increases the cycle of poverty."

Campaign 2000 needs help, she said, in making sure that post-secondary education is affordable, and that grants are available.

Feldman told the students that a major problem of being poor and Jewish, is that people living here do not realize poverty is a Jewish problem. "Poor people are often too embarrassed to acknowledge their plight. It is a double whammy; being poor and being Jewish."

The community gives people money for necessities such as food and shelter, she said, but the challenge is to help them help themselves. "I want you to think of ideas to help people become independent."

Ophir, an emissary from Israel to UJA Federation asked the students to erase everything they take for granted. "That is the only way to understand how difficult life is for Ethiopian immigrants."

He agreed that food and shelter is not difficult to provide. "The real problem is helping them become productive members of Israeli society. It takes time to bridge the gap, and feel part of Israel."

After the sessions, Jackson told the students that some things are beyond people's control. "It is important to take away the stigma of poverty. It is not always someone's fault."

Arafat's unworkable modus vivendi

Yasser Arafat has developed a unique style of negotiating with the various governments of Israel that have been his bargaining partners since 1993. Typically, he puts forward a demand that he knows, in the circumstances at hand, Israel will be unable to accept. True to form, Israel does not accept. He complains loudly and provocatively to the media. The media oblige him. Israel digs in its heels. Arafat walks away from the table, effectively, if not actually, suspending the negotiations, declaring the discussions to be at a crisis. Israel urges him to return to the table. He refuses, accusing Israel of trying to dictate terms. And then he reaches for the same, tired ace up his sleeve: the U.S. government. He calls upon the American administration to intervene.

The pattern is familiar and counter-productive.

Two weeks ago, Arafat suspended negotiations after Israel refused to submit to his request to immediately hand over Abu Dis, a suburb on the outskirts of Jerusalem, to Palestinian Authority control, as part of the next IDF withdrawal. By asking for Abu Dis at this stage in the negotiations, Arafat was essentially placing the enormously difficult subject of Jerusalem on the negotiating table far ahead of the originally agreed plan. He was also deliberately provoking public opinion in Israel, thus significantly constraining Prime Minister Ehud Barak's ability to find an accommodation.

Israel's chief negotiator with the PA, Oded Eran, plaintively expressed the Israeli frustration with Arafat's modus operandi. "Instead of their preoccupations with what Barak wants, the Palestinians should decide what they want. If they want negotiations, the only way is to return to the conference table and continue the discussions, even if they don't agree with some or other Israel positions. I don't understand this method of stopping the negotiations."

Thus, there is the impression, generated by the Palestinians and eagerly accepted by a willing western media, that relations between Israel and the PA seem always to be in crisis. But that would not be completely accurate.

Last week, the security services of the PA combined with Israel's security services to thwart an intended terror operation by Hamas inside Jerusalem. In a co-ordinated, pre-emptive police operation lasting a number of weeks, the security forces arrested dozens of Hamas militants suspected of planning to blow up a building in Israel's capital. Among the arrested were some people who admitted to perpetrating the recent terror attacks in Hadera and Netanya.

Behind the scenes, the situation is not all crisis and condemnation.

Canada near frigid toward Israel

Your editorial, "The Gavel in Canada's hand" (CJN, Feb. 10), gave me a bit of a chuckle. Surely, you can not be serious.

Ever since the mid-'60s, Canada, reinventing herself as "a middle power the world trusts" has made a virtue out of making the morally unequal into equals. You may have noticed that both in domestic politics and in foreign policy, this country has chosen to erase all distinctions between those who do and those who don't deserve our support. Whether it involves the pending deportation of known Nazi war criminals or the refusal for entry to an obviously bogus refugee status claimant with a tainted resume, our government's capacity for compassion knows no bounds. However, when it comes to other causes, Canada's ardour drops to tepid. In the case of Israel, Canada's attitude was always near frigid.

On occasion of state visits by Israel's representatives, Ottawa issues forth those expected and meaningless pieties about shared democratic traditions. But seldom are words followed by deeds that forge real friendships. How many times over the years during crucial debates at the United Nations, when Israel was being vilified by her enemies and "friends," did Canada step forward and support Israel? How many do you recall? It either joined in the vilification or did the cowardly thing and abstained. Some friend!

These facts are all too well known. Then why would you be appalled by Canada's action in Moscow, the result of which could only mean more tribulation for Israel?

Questions League's audit

Re: "Anti-Semitism, hate on the rise: League audit" (Feb. 17). If you plan to draw any meaningful conclusions from numerical data, you must apply the appropriate statistical techniques. Had the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights done so, they might have seen that the table of numbers accompanying the article on the audit did not support the conclusions that were reported.

These anti-Semitic acts are random events. While it may seem obvious to the untrained observer that the numbers for 1999 are slightly larger than those for 1998, that increase is too small to meet the basic statistical criteria that would confirm any firm conclusion that hate was on the rise. By finding increases where there are none, the real meaning of that data may have been lost.

My analysis shows that the number of events grew in the '80s and has remained steady throughout the '90s, in spite of a steadily increasing population. Maybe we're starting to win, but it's going to take a few more years before we have the statistics we need to make any firm conclusions. In the meantime, I recommend that we remain vigilant and avoid crying "wolf!"

Protection not limited to Israel

I have always been aware of Prof. Gerald Steinberg's right-wing bias towards the Oslo accords and the peace process, but his latest diatribe linking the pervasive degree of corruption at all levels of Israeli society to the original socialist government borders on the ridiculous. (CJN, Feb. 3).

In this day of intensive investigative reporting, what country is immune to charges of high level corruption? It is Russia, the countries of Asia, Africa, South America, Central America, Mexico, Japan, now France, Germany, the U.K., or yes, even the United States and Canada? Are tax evasion and direct cash dealings exclusive to Israel or do we not see this in other countries (in Canada)? Steinberg needs to be reminded that "protection" is a worldwide phenomenon not limited to Israel and not related to a former communist regime, nor to a capitalist one, nor to a dictatorship, nor to a democratic society.

Criticism of Haider justified

The world has begun to show its scorn to Austria. On their own soil, thousands of Austrians have been taking to the streets in protest, chanting "Nazi out." Europe has threatened to politically and economically isolate the Alpine nation, and is considering throwing it out of the European Union. Israel has recalled its ambassador and has forbidden Haider to visit. And Canada, for its part, has said it will take "concrete measures" if there's evidence that minority groups are being threatened.

But on the whole, reaction to Haider's racist, extreme right-wing views and his ascent to power have been passive. Haider's remarks and behaviour have been common knowledge for some time. The Freedom Party's campaign has also been in the public eyes for quite awhile. Yet a Nazi sympathizer is still able to rise to power.

It's true that Haider was voted into power by the people of Austria, and many argue that the international community has no business getting involved in a country's political affairs. But not too long ago the same was said about Adolf Hitler, who was also elected – as chancellor of Germany. The world knows all to well where this democratic election led.

The rights of democratic expression in this case cannot take precedence over the security of all those who don't fit Haider's mould of the genuine native Austrian. While some, including Haider, have criticized the EU for overstepping its bounds and violating its own rules by threatening economic sanctions, in this situation the Union is fully justified. Anti-foreigner sentiment and anti-Semitic acts have already been on the rise in Austria, a country whose own active role during the Hitler era is not forgotten.

The history of the Yiddish Theatre

By BARUCH COHEN

for Malka

"I flew from Warsaw to Bucharest to participate in the celebration of the 80th anniversary of the founding of the professional Yiddish theatre by the father of Yiddish theatre, Abraham Goldfaden" — Ida Kaminska: My Life, My Theatre, 1973.

The Yiddish theatre boasts of a tradition that goes back more than 130 years. Documents testify to the fact that in Yassy, Romania, in the famous Green Tree (Pomul Verde) garden, the writer and artist Avrom (Abraham) Goldfaden laid the foundation for the first professional Yiddish theatre in the world. It was here that in 1865, he and his company staged their first performances.

Abraham Goldfaden

The earliest critic's review of Jewish theatre in Romania was published in 1876 in the newspaper Curierul din Iasi [the Yassy Courier], issue Number 93, by the renowned Romanian poet Mihai Eminescu, who praised the performance despite his known anti-Semitism. In 1877, Goldfaden's theatrical company came to the country's capital, Bucharest, where it gave several performances on the permanent stage at the Lazar Cafegiul (Lazar the Coffee-house-Keeper) lounge.

In its first decades of activity, Yiddish theatre did not have an easy start. For a long time, precarious financial circumstances prevented the setting up of a company with permanent actors. Nevertheless, these insecure financial conditions did not prevent the artistic development of the genre in Romania, where gifted actors and supporters always found resources for their creative dedication.

Starting in 1916, the great stage director and teacher Iacob Sternberg contributed his rich creative abilities, staging musicals and dramatic performances. In 1930, he set up a studio, Di Bukarester Yiddishe Theatre Studio, where he attempted to achieve a synthesis of the modern trends of the European theatre of the time.

In the mid-19th century, the Yiddish world saw debates between Maskilim and Chassidim. It was also a time of thriving productions of drama and fiction.

Another institution – Di Broder Zinger – evolved quite independently as an outgrowth of genuine folk art.

The Broder singers were bards or troubadours, essentially secular badchenim (entertainers), who were proliferating in Eastern Europe, and not only in respectable Jewish households. They became the first professional actors and producers in modern Yiddish culture.

Their name, Broder, had its roots in the Galician (eastern Polish) city of Brod or Brody. As Nahma Sandrow cites in her study of Yiddish theatre, Vagabond Stars, A World History of Yiddish Theatre, "By the 1860s many 'Broders' were singing and acting in Poland, Russia, and especially Romania, where the wine was most plentiful."

While Romania played host to its local drama groups, Yiddish theatre was gaining prestige abroad, and an acting group from Vilna, led by Paul Baratoff and his actors, Maurice Schwartz and Iosif Buloff, left unforgettable memories for audiences in Romania.

Avrom (Abraham) Goldfaden, however, is considered the real father of Yiddish theatre. Beginning in 1876, he wrote the first professional plays and musicals, and produced their performances. Under his guidance, in his troupes, the Yiddish theatre began to take shape.

Even before 1876, Goldfaden had begun his work in the theatre. He had already established his reputation as a poet and songwriter, publishing two volumes of lyrics. His compositions were part of the repertoires of many Broder singers even before he later incorporated their "jester" traditions into his own performances.

The jester tradition, in fact, was an aspect of Yiddish folk art essential to Goldfaden's career – his father's nickname for him when he was a boy in the 1850s, had been Avromele badchen (Little Abie the jester).

Like Brod (Brody), Yassy profited from trade routes to the west. In 1876, there was a particularly large number of successful traders stationed in the city. It seemed to Goldfaden that Yassy could provide a steady public for Yiddish theatre.

Nahma Sandrow describes Goldfaden's professional debut: "In his autobiography, Goldfaden records that he went one evening, soon after his arrival in Yassy, to a wine garden, Shimen Mark's Pomul Verde (The Green Tree).

"He went especially to hear his songs sung by a very successful Broder singer named Israel Grodner. The thought occurred to him that the material would be much more interesting if it were integrated into a play, as he had seen in non-Yiddish plays in Western Europe, Russia, and Romania. He sent for Grodner and they were off."

Goldfaden's plays inform us about the intricacies of daily life in his times. True, they are not great or profound literature, but Goldfaden rarely claimed them to be. Still, most of his shows are stirring, lyrical, comical, and certainly very touching. Goldfaden was showman enough to catch on to what his audience would like.

From Yassy, he and his actors went to Botosani, Braila, and Galatzi, Romania.

In 1877, within a year of his debut, Goldfaden was already writing plays that had some substance. By 1880, he had written Shmendrik, The Two Kuni-Lemels, and The Witch.

Yiddish theatre as an institution grew rapidly. As Jews became more worldly, the theatre's public expanded. Goldfaden recruited new actors. In fact, most of the actors who were to become famous in the first half-century of Yiddish theatre started out performing with him, including the great Jacob Adler, Sigmund Mogulesku, and David Kessler.

The plays went over very well, and Goldfaden, fired by ambition, left for Bucharest. There he was able to arrange only one performance at the Jignitza Theatre.

I remember, from the early 1930s, that my parents took me to this location many times, and we enjoyed the appearances of Iosef Buloff, Molly Picon, Hertz Grosbart, Sigmund Turkov, Sydi Thal, Sevila Pastor and other outstanding Jewish actors.

Goldfaden's plays drew all classes of people: wealthy Jews, intellectuals, poor people and the ignorant! They liked the songs, the dances, and the divertissements after the play. And the plays gave them a hearty laugh.

In 1926, at the Jignitza Garden Theatre in Bucharest, a great evening of Yiddish theatre marked the celebration of the 50th anniversary of Yiddish theatre.

The writers Iacob Sternberg, Itzik Manger, and Shlomo Bikel were among those who partook in the festivities. The dean emeritus of the Romanian theatre, Prof. Constantin Nottara, declared: "It is a great honour for me to be here and bring greetings to a great talent, a creative force in the life, not only to the Yiddish theatre, but to the Romanian theatre as well."

During World War II, the racial laws in Romania caused Yiddish theatre to cease functioning. Nonetheless, a number of Jewish actors, who had been deported to Transnistria, organized evenings of Yiddish theatre in the lagers of Vapniarka, Jmerinka, and Moghilev.

Simultaneously in Bucharest, Jewish actors organized in synagogues from 1940-1944, under the pretext of holding "commemorations." These events allowed them to produce dramas and festivals devoted to Jewish writers; they staged fragments of plays and gave poetry readings.

Although the audiences did not dare to applaud, they shouted the toast, L'chaim, at the end of each number.

Thus,during the years of the ruthless Iron Guard and fascist terror, under the very nose of the political police, the lofty human ideas of the classics of Yiddish literature were spread – though in Romanian. Jewish theatre was not allowed until after the war.

Before World War II, there had been five Yiddish theatres in Romania – two in Bucharest, two in Cernowitz, and one in Yassy. In 1948, the first state theatres were set up, among which was the Jewish State Theatre of Bucharest. Performances were again in Yiddish.

Poster for Goldfaden's operetta, Shulamis, 1881.

In 1972, the Jewish State Theatre of Bucharest toured the United States and Canada with great success. Clive Barnes, drama critic for the New York Times, praised its performance of The Dybbuk as "outstanding, rarely seen on our stages."

The Jewish State Theatre of Bucharest survived Nicolae Ceausescu and has continued its activities with Jewish and Romanian actors to this very day, performing both classical and modern plays in Yiddish.

The Austrian aberration

When I agreed to address this rally, I thought that the issue before us was quite clear. But since then, voices in Canada, England and elsewhere have tried to tell us that we are all wrong to assemble and protest the odious pronouncements of Joerg Haider and his party.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

"Wait for what they do," we are advised.

I disagree strongly. Those of you who, like me, have experienced Nazism first hand know why we must be here and why we cannot listen to those who still do not understand the danger we are trying to expose.

If a contagious bug has been discovered anywhere, we know what to do. We do not wait until it shows up full-blown in a ravaging disease. We isolate it so that it cannot spread its deadly poison. This is what the worldwide reaction to the Freedom Party is all about.

If the Austrians do not understand it, or if well-meaning journalists don't get it, then we have to tell them the bitter reality of the illness that has broken out in central Europe.

They tell us that, after all, Haider's party was elected democratically and that we must therefore respect the will of the people. Wrong in a case such as this! Hitler's party too was elected democratically, and much good it did the Weimar Republic. If the world had isolated Hitler then and there, there might not have been World War II and the Shoah.

They say that Haider is no Hitler. I hope they are right. But the fact that the Freedom Party was elected on racist rhetoric and on promises of racial purity has worried a lot of Austrians themselves. At one rally, 300,000 demonstrated in Vienna against the government. If Haider wants to rejoin the ranks of decent folk, let him stop demonizing people who were not born in Austria as unworthy of human rights. Xenophobia is the front door to racism.

We Jews know that the kind of program the Freedom Party is pursuing is a slippery slope that leads to hell. This is a human concern and not just Jewish idiosyncrasy. France and Germany and the other European governments that have isolated Austria represent the fears of people who were once touched by the effects of xenophobic oratory.

We do not apologize for warning the world of a deadly virus that has already brought too much suffering to all too many people. We will do anything to stop the disease from spreading. We will say it today and we will say it tomorrow: "Never again!"

Jerusalem's double standard

If some words are more loaded than others, Israel – along with much of the western world – has been demonstrating recently that offensive statements pack a different punch depending on their origin.

Far be it for me to defend Austrian far-right leader Joerg Haider, but it's hard not to wonder why Jerusalem has gone ballistic against him while showing surprising tolerance of more repugnant rhetoric from our so-called "peace partners."

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Hours before Haider's Freedom Party entered the new coalition government in Vienna last month, Israel recalled its ambassador in Austria in protest.

Since then, Prime Minister Ehud Barak and various cabinet members have frequently denounced Haider and his party, vilifying them as a pack of neo-Nazis.

Amid reports that Haider wanted to visit Israel, Interior Minister Natan Sharansky declared him persona non grata, refusing him a visa.

Currently in Israel, Haider is Public Enemy Number One. Across the political spectrum, public figures have weighed in with moral outrage, condemning Haider as the personification of evil and a dire threat to European democracy.

Several Knesset members from both the coalition and opposition came together recently in a rare show of unity at the Austrian embassy in Tel Aviv to demonstrate their anger and disgust.

In mid-February, the Jewish Agency called a press conference in Jerusalem at which its chair, Sallai Meridor, appealed to world Jewry and "other people of conscience" to support the Agency's call for an international boycott of Austria.

All this righteous indignation has left me confused. Agreed Austria has a time-honoured tradition of anti-Semitism. Agreed Hitler was Austrian as were some of his top henchmen. Agreed Austria has never really faced up to its eager embrace of Nazism before and during World War II. Agreed Austrians elected Kurt Waldheim as president despite his Nazi past. Agreed Haider's comments lauding Hitler's employment policies and the SS as men of character were repulsive.

Still, it's no justification for Jerusalem's double standard. Would someone please explain to me the battle cry against Austria in contrast to our usual complacency to the steady barrage of anti-Semitic venom from the Palestinian Authority, Egypt and Syria.

True to form, during the same time the world was busy turning Haider into a pariah, Syria's state-run press did Nazi propagandist Joseph Goebbels proud on several occasions.

In late February, a front page editorial in Al-Thawra insisted that Zionism equals Nazism. It also defended the infamous 1975 United Nations resolution denouncing Zionism as racism.

Two weeks earlier, Tishrin, another government-controlled daily in Damascus, published a lead editorial saying the Holocaust was a myth created by Israel to receive money from Germany and other countries.

In the Palestinian Authority, the media and school textbooks give the Syrians a good run for anti-Semitic supremacy. This despite a specific clause in the Oslo Accords obligating the Palestinians to refrain from such incitement.

Haider may be an obnoxious xenophobe and conniving Austrian chauvinist but if we're serious about going after those who betray real hostility to Israel, if not outright hatred of Jews, the most dangerous threats loom closer to home.

Last week, in a long overdue reaction, Barak condemned the latest wave of anti-Israel incitement in the Arab world in a speech in Jerusalem to visiting Jewish leaders from the United States.

Sadly in the next sentence, however, he made it seem almost understandable, saying the Arabs' hate-filled invective was a sign of their frustration with the current stalemate in the peace process. If only it were "just" a recent passing phenomenon as Barak made it seem.

The strident anti-Jewish, anti-Israel invective in the Arab media is nothing new. But the fact it persists unabated, despite the peace process, despite complaints about it from previous Israeli governments, despite Barak's heaping praise on Arab leaders on many occasions makes it all the more alarming.

However loathsome Joerg Haider and some of his ideas may seem, they are nothing next to the words and weapons in the Middle East directed at Israel.

So instead of focusing our fury on Austria, let's remember who's stockpiling tons of mustard gas and anthrax and building missiles to deliver them at our doorstep.

Peace still a distant prospect

Recent events in Lebanon and Syria demonstrate that despite the frantic American efforts, peace, in any meaningful sense, is as far off as ever.

Under these circumstances, polls show that the majority of Israelis now realize that surrendering the Golan Heights would be suicidal.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Syria is still the most hostile and implacable of Israel's immediate neighbours, and has not given up the goal of destroying the Jewish State.

Until 1967, Syrian army positions shelled Israeli civilians, including the fishermen in the Sea of Galilee. Captured Israeli soldiers were systematically tortured and brutalized, and some committed suicide while being held. Others simply disappeared.

At the end of the 1973 war, Syrian officials refused to sit in the same room with Israelis to negotiate a ceasefire, and when Kissinger finally worked out the details, an Egyptian officer had to be found to sign for the Syrians.

Whenever an Israeli official got up to speak at the UN or some other international organization, the Syrians would walk out.

In a recent UN discussion, Syrian representatives tried to block Hadassah's application for observer status in a specialized agency by invoking the infamous resolution equating Zionism to racism.

For decades, the official media has peddled crude anti-Israeli hatred and incitement, often crossing the line into anti-Semitism. Syria sponsors and harbours some of the world's most notorious terrorists, and is supporting a proxy war of terror against Israel waged from Lebanon.

Given this background, the Israeli public, across the spectrum, needs clear evidence of fundamental changes. At this stage, the atmosphere of the negotiations is more important than the language of the draft texts.

The hostility evident in Foreign Minister Shara's body language, and the frank statements he continues to make reinforce the view that in Damascus, nothing has changed.

On January 27, Shara openly restated the Ba'ath party's goal of using a peace agreement "void of any meaning" as part of the overall strategy "for the liberation [of Palestine]."

The viscous hate-filled attacks that continue in the official Syrian press are also widely reported in Israel.

On January 31, the editors of Tishrin termed the Holocaust "a myth" and charged that "what Israel is committing now against Arabs is more horrible than Nazism."

They wrote that Israel "buried alive people and hostages, committed massacres against innocents, escalated expansion and aggression" and called Israel "the disease of the Third Millennium."

Far from an isolated incident in a marginal paper, this is a common theme in the official mouthpieces of the regime.

The continued terrorism on the Lebanese-Israeli border is also a sign of continuing Syrian hostility, and indicates that support for terrorist attacks will continue, even if a treaty is signed.

The picture that emerges is one of a Syrian leadership that has no interest in ending the conflict. Assad may think that Barak can deliver the Israeli public regardless of the circumstances, but this is incorrect.

Given the long and bitter history, on issues of war and peace, survival and obliteration, a very narrow majority would not sustain such difficult decisions.

To create wide support for peace, Egypt's President Sadat came to Jerusalem, addressed the Knesset, and talked directly to the Israeli public with dignity and respect. The late King Hussein of Jordan took a similar route, as did Palestinian leaders.

While the hatred and anti-Semitism have not disappeared from the media in these cases, there are clear efforts to counter incitement. Similarly, Egypt, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority have taken some visible action to prevent terrorist attacks.

In contrast, Syrian officials continue to refer to Sadat's peace-making efforts as "the greatest mistake of the Arab world in the 20th century."

With such views coming out of Damascus, Israelis remain skeptical, and will view any quick change in behaviour as little more than a temporary and tactical ceasefire.

Skyscrapers change Tel Aviv's appearance

If you haven't noticed lately, Tel Aviv, founded in 1909 as the first all-Jewish city, is growing vertically. As late as 15 or 20 years ago, Tel Aviv's skyline, the Shalom Tower notwithstanding, was uniformly low-slung. But no more. As a new millennium dawns, highrise towers are sprouting, not only transforming Tel Aviv's appearance, but changing the centre of gravity of its downtown core.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

If any single building is emblematic of this new era in Tel Aviv's architectural development, it is probably the 68-storey Ramat Gan Gate Tower, scheduled to be completed in 2001. Last summer, when I gazed at this concrete work in progress, 30 stories had been built.

Its significance is twofold, explained Amnon Schwartz, who designed this soaring monolith sheathed in glass, aluminum and granite in collaboration with his partner, Amnon Niv.

Two hundred and fifty metres high, with 70,000 square metres of office and condominium space and 1,200 parking spots, the Ramat Gan Gate Tower will be the tallest building in Israel and, indeed, the entire Middle East.

Amnon Schwartz

At present, Israel's highest skyscraper soars 50 stories heavenward. It is part of the Azrieli Centre in Tel Aviv, built by Montreal contractor/architect David Azrieli, the builder of the first mall in Israel.

With the completion of the Ramat Gan Gate Tower, one more nail will have been hammered into Tel Aviv's old business centre, which radiated from Allenby Street before and after Israel's statehood in 1948.

Ragged at the edges, this neighbourhood has been in a state of decline for years now. "Allenby is finished," observed Schwartz, a principal of AmAv, one of Israel's leading architecture firms.

The Ramat Gan Gate Tower is rising on a tight little parcel of land that was once an eyesore, a miasma of ugly workshops. The modest plot upon which it stands was originally meant for semi-detached housing, but these units were never built, and the area was subsequently designated for light industrial use.

Costing $100 million (US), one of the most expensive projects in Israeli history, the Ramat Gan Gate Tower will join eight existing skyscrapers already in the vicinity. Within five years, Schwartz estimated, there will be 20 towers in the surrounding streets. When all these buildings are in place, he predicted, Ramat Gan will be Tel Aviv's gleaming new downtown.

This bristling complex, some two kilometres from the shimmering Mediterranean Sea, is within easy walking distance of the Elite chocolate and candy factory and the quiet residential quarter devastated by Iraqi Scud missiles during the 1991 Gulf War. In a symbolic sense, then, Israel is snubbing its nose at Iraq.

One of the proprietors of the Ramat Gan Gate Tower, apparently the first in Israel to combine offices with condos, is a Syrian Jewish builder, Moshe Aviv. He and a consortium of overseas investors are behind the project, and according to Schwartz, they have spared no funds to get it right. "We're using the best available materials. Moshe Aviv regards this building as a monument to his career."

Clearly, it is also a monument to Schwartz, who, with Niv, shares the title of AmAv's senior architect.

Born in Haifa in 1939, the son of Hugo and Henya, German Jews who helped establish Kibbutz Ashdod Ya'acov, Schwartz is a graduate of the Technion.

From 1958 to 1963, he worked on the design of Israel's nuclear research institute in Dimona. Since then, he has designed Etzel House – the prize-winning, seaside museum which commemorates the soldiers killed in the conquest of Jaffa during the War of Independence – and two nearby buildings, Gibor House and the Textile Manufacturers' Exchange, both of which are 22 stories.

Prior to the Yom Kippur War, Schwartz designed the Canadian Pacific Hotel in Tel Aviv, the construction of which was cancelled following the outbreak of hostilities in 1973.

Currently, he is drawing up a master plan for Manshiya, a depressed area of rubble-strewn fields physically dividing Tel Aviv from Jaffa. If the mixed-use project ever materializes, the face of southern Tel Aviv will never be the same again, he said.

For the moment, Schwartz seems consumed by the Ramat Gan Gate Tower project. As we rode a rickety elevator to the 30th floor on a bright, sunny day, he marvelled, "When I was younger, I could not have conceived of such a building in Israel. Just as I never believed that Israel and Egypt would be at peace."

The path-breaking Ramat Gan Gate Tower may well signify a revolution in Israeli architecture. As we talked, Schwartz told me that plans are afoot to construct a 70-storey skyscraper in Tel Aviv. Where will it all end? The Manhattanization of Tel Aviv? Schwartz doubts it. "I don't expect a boom in highrises. Plots of this size are hard to find in Israel."

Unique figure

"Irving Berlin has no place in American music," observed the composer Jerome Kern. "Irving Berlin IS American music."

This tribute was not merely an exercise in hyperbole. Berlin, even today, remains a unique figure in the pantheon of famous songwriters. Of his thousands of compositions, 451 were hits and 35 were rated as the most popular songs of their day. From Cheek to Cheek to God Bless America, Berlin produced a prodigious body of work that has yet to be equalled.

The secret of his success was was an ability to transcend musical fashions and tastes, writes Philip Furia in Irving Berlin (Schirmer Books), a perceptive biography which traces the arc of his life from his birth in Russia to his adopted homeland in the United States.

The son of an itinerant cantor who could barely make ends meet, Berlin left school at an early age to assist his impoverished family. He ran errands, he delivered telegrams, he sewed collars in a sweatshop. By 13, he was a singing waiter in a saloon and a street busker, having told his mother that his ambition was to write songs. She must have been appalled. But in 1911, at the age of 23, he was already a success, having earned more than $100,000 in royalties. His first truly great song, Alexander's Ragtime Band, was tossed off in 18 minutes, in a spasm of sheer inspiration.

Berlin was not only incredibly creative; he was blessed by business acumen. Realizing that a lyricist received only a few cents in royalties from any given song, he established his own company and thus owned the copyrights for his songs. He earned a fortune.

His wealth did not impress Clarence Mackay, a Catholic multimillionaire whose daughter, Ellin, had fallen in love with Berlin. Mackay tried to sabotage their budding relationship, but to no avail. They were married and lived happily ever after.

In his waning years, with his health in precipitous decline, Berlin was a bitter and angry person, communicating almost exclusively by phone. A sad end to a great life.

Honest self-examination needed

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The first secular Jew, as Baruch Spinoza was called by Israeli scholar Yirmiyahu Yovel, once offered the less than original thesis that anti-Semitism is the great Jewish unifier: "That they have been preserved in great measure by gentile hatred, experience demonstrates."

Reverse the equation and you have the condition of contemporary Jewry – happily decimated by gentile love. We'll eat their food, get drunk on their culture, marry them. What we protest against is gentile spirituality invading our borders.

All Jews draw an imaginary circle called Judaism. Inside it are placed people and groups who are felt to represent legitimate expressions of the religion. There is no one who does not draw such a circle. Not just the Orthodox, who easily proclaim Reform Judaism a rank heresy, but even the most secular Jew has little trouble declaring a Jew for Jesus, for instance, as beyond the Jewish pale.

It would appear fortunate, then, that we currently have the proselytizing Southern Baptists and Jews for Jesus to bemoan. We can convene meetings and conferences and decry the Christian missionary who refuses to play by the rules of a liberal pluralistic democracy. Instead, he takes what he sees as the truth – whether erroneous or not is immaterial – very seriously. He feels that if he has the "good news," it should be shared, by duplicitous means or otherwise.

The deceitful tactics of Jews for Jesus are, of course, contemptible – wouldn't it be more honest to call it Christianity? – and have been nobly combated by groups like Jews for Judaism. But it is important to realize that our fear of them is also a stunning condemnation of our inability to care with as much passion about Judaism as they do about their version of the messiah. What many modern Jews would like most is the freedom to be left alone to assimilate in peace, something that certain Christians stubbornly refuse to grant us.

A student of mine related to our Talmud class how she and her Bialik classmates, on a Grade 8 trip to New York, had visited, among other places, a church. No doubt, the same Jewish edu cators who take their children on excur sions to churches would savage the ide of proselytization.

It is time to wake up. For many be lievers throughout the world, religion i for keeps. The faithful drink from it breathe through it, sacrifice for it, and di for it. People in the west generally despis such fundamentalist intensity – Jewish Christian, Muslim, Hindu – and such lack of multicultural tolerance. Is our re vulsion felt because many Jews, exped ent relativists to the last, cannot imagin the idea of actually believing that some thing is absolutely true, and hence cannc be negotiated or compromised?

If Jews for Jesus wish to prey on som of the more vulnerable parts of our com munity, then let's take the hint and begi to reach out to those who are currentl marginalized, with a Judaism that is com passionate and inviting. Let's act as i Judaism, not in theory but in actual dail practice, is worth living for and spread ing to others. We do not need the Christ ian bogeyman to keep Judaism afloat What we need is some honest self-exam ination as to where our spirituality lie and how it can be saved.

Spiritual health essential

By SANDY STERN and RABBI MICHAEL SKOBAC

Guest Voices

We have become almost numb these days from all the hand-wringing over the growing number of drop-outs from the Jewish community.

Sensing that Judaism has little relevance to their lives, more and more Jews are seeking spiritual nourishment in foreign pastures such as Christianity and Buddhism. Many are simply joining the growing ranks of "Jews for Nothing."

We'd like to focus the spotlight, for now, on a vital and related issue: What about us? What about those of us who belong, contribute, affiliate and identify? How many of us attend services, classes and programs regularly and enthusiastically? How often do we feel profoundly moved and inspired? Is the experience of Judaism in our lives deeply joyous, or do we often find ourselves going through the motions by rote?

During a recent address, Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz probed, "Where is the elation we should feel as a community? Where is the dancing, the singing, the feeling that something happened here in shul that moved you… Passion is not a luxury that we can live without. It's a matter of life or death… The rejuvenation we need will change us so much that we won't just go to shul, we'll run to shul!"

In The Karate Kid, the patient Mr. Miagi emphasized the importance of "balance" to his young student. The Jewish world is truly blessed with an abundance of scholarship, books and opportunities for study. It is impossible to grow spiritually without accessing this holy wisdom. Yet there is a lack of balance in our community. We often encounter a tyranny of the intellect where there is a premium placed on knowledge, with less emphasis on the path of the heart. Simplicity, sincerity and focus on our inner lives need to be valued and restored to a position of primacy.

Aside from the need to bring our souls in from the cold, there is room for improvement in our communities when it comes to being warm, welcoming and non-judgmental. This openness extend to families as well. In advising parent on how to deal with a child who wa going through a rebellious period, th Baal Shem Tov advised: "You need t love him more."

We are deeply concerned about th spiritual health of our communities. We'r praying for an awakening, and th courage and strength to change. And w are going to try and nudge things alon by forming a group of like-minded peopl who want to move in these directions.

We want to establish a nurturing an supportive environment for individual seeking a closer relationship with God an others. We envision a joyful place of in formal prayer and meditation and a space with soulful and spirit-moving music. W hope to create a safe and comfortabl forum for people to share and explore thei questions, doubts, struggles and triumphs With the help of God, others may form similar groups. The ripple may help spar a renaissance in our community where we'll go beyond surviving to thriving.

Pope visits Israel

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When Pope John Paul II touches down in Israel on March 21st and kisses the ground, it will mark the first time that a pope has visited the region since 1964. His trip will include state arrival and departure ceremonies, meetings with the president, prime minister and chief rabbis, visits to Yad VaShem and the Western Wall – plus official meetings in Palestinian controlled areas. And along the way, his every word and gesture will be scrutinized for their religious and political repercussions.

Last April, Israeli Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon invited the Pope to pay an official visit during the country's millennium celebrations.

Sharon thanked the Pope for his efforts in combating anti-Semitism, his relationship with the Jews, promoting human rights and brotherhood between nations [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH0efx0].

Not all Israelis share Sharon's enthusiasm about the Pope's pilgrimage.

Time magazine summarized the general ambivalence toward the trip in its article, Israel to Pope: Welcome – Now Go Home. The visit may pack a lot of public relations value but "the history of anti-Semitism in the Catholic Church makes Israelis deeply resentful of the Pope. Despite his efforts to rectify some of the wrongs, many Jews believe official Catholic attitudes contributed directly to the Holocaust, and that the church hasn't made an adequate apology." [http://www.pathfinder.com/time/daily/0,2960,36356-101991220,00.html].

And those feelings haven't been helped in recent weeks with February's Vatican-Palestinian agreement which strongly condemns Israel's hold over all of Jerusalem as "morally and legally unacceptable." [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2000/02/16/News/News.2731.html].

Meanwhile huge posters protesting the visit have appeared in Jerusalem's haredi neighbourhood of Mea Shearim.

They proclaim "For sorrow comes when the enemy is at the gates of Jerusalem." [http://www.gsnonweb.com/gsnlib_a/gsn2000/2000_02/20000215/60978.html].

Officially the country is going all out to welcome the Pope. A tent city for 6,000 is being built in the Galilee, roads are being levelled to provide a smooth, level path to the Church of the Holy Sepulcher and total infrastructure costs will likely approach $6 million. And from arrival until departure, Israel's Shin Bet will provide the Pope's security [http://www.gsnonweb.com/gsnlib_a/gsn2000/2000_02/20000214/60889.html].

An article such as this one cannot cover in detail Israel's contacts with the Pope nor the Vatican's historical relationship with the Jews.

For more related documents, see the Vatican, the Pope, Israel and the Jews [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/anti-semitism/vaticantoc.html]. The Vatican and the Middle East [http://www.albushra.org/vatican/0vatican.htm] and the Vatican's official site [http://www.vatican.va].

Despite Israel's efforts to make him feel at home, the Pope will notice one difference during his trip. While in Jerusalem, he will have to do his waving from a Chevrolet Suburban. The popemobile is just too wide to negotiate the narrow streets of the Old City [http://www.gsnonweb.com/gsnlib_a/gsn2000/2000_02/20000215/61051.html].

Chassidic anthology

The Religious Thought of Hasidism Text and Commentary*, by Norman Lamm (Yeshiva University Press).

This massive anthology brings together 400 selections by 30 teachers and masters from the first three generations of the chassidic movement – up until about 1812. The founder of the movement, the semi-legendary Israel Ba'al Shem Tov lived from 1700 to 1760.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Lamm, president of Yeshiva University and a renowned scholar, has divided the work into 18 basic subject sections. They include such broad topics as God and Providence, The Soul, Faith, Love and Fear, Worship, Service of God, Torah Study, The Zaddic, Repentance, Peace, Evil and Suffering, and Life and Death.

These selections are, for the most part, brief. But the author provides an incisive, knowledgeable and cogent commentary on the often obscure references and unfamiliar ideas expressed. He also presents a sketch of the historical background of the early chassidic movement, and charts its central ideas within the wider intellectual and historical context of Jewish religious and mystical thought.

The teachings that follow (some are excerpts from larger selections) convey some feelings for the book's variety and subject matter.

Perpetual Immanence – Source: Iggesht, Keter Shem Tov II.

The Creator is found in every act of physical movement. It is impossible to make any motion or to utter any word without the power of the Creator. That is the meaning of "the whole earth is full of His glory" (Isa. 6:3).

When you perform one of God's commandments with all your strength and emotions, even including joyous inspiration in fulfilling a mitzvah, you arouse all the worlds with this joy, adding strength to the heavenly family, so to speak, and elevating all the worlds, including yourself, up to the Supernal Will. From there return, bringing down grace (sheaf) from world to world, all the way to this lowliest and nethermost of worlds.

The rabbis said: "One must not rise to pray in sadness ... only in the joy of performing a mitzvah." Man's loftiest quality is the spirit of joyfulness. If joy is derived from doing a mitzvah, it produces a yihud ("unification") that is superior to everything.

The zaddik must be both a scholar in Torah and pious in good deeds. He must be a scholar because the rabbis said, "The ignoramus cannot be pious." But to be a scholar and completely wicked at the same time, as the rabbis said, "If he uses the Torah the right way, it becomes a deadly poison for him." Therefore, the zaddik must be both a scholar and a pious man."

• No Time For Quarrels – Source: R. Nahamn of Bratslav, Likkutei Etzot.

The whole world is full of quarrels: among the nations, in every city, in every home, among neighbours, between a man and his wife, and his family and his servants and his children, and so on. No one pays attention to the (bitter) end, that every day man dies. For the day that has passed will never return, and each day he draws closer to death. How does he find time to waste on quarrels.

Therefore, anyone of even minimum intelligence should take this to heart and learn patience and not waste his days in quarrels, large or small. One should restrain his emotions and his anger and live in peace with everyone.

This volume of 700 pages includes brief biographies of the writers, a select bibliography, a helpful glossary and a full index of scriptural citations, names and subjects. The Religious Thought of Hasidism is an impressive work of scholarship that provides an excellent window through which to view the world of chassidic thought and practices.

Blacks, Jews discuss ways to renew old alliances

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "We have something in common, we're both on the receiving end of negativity," said Rosemary Sadlier, president of the Ontario Black History Society.

She was speaking to a standing-room only crowd of 250 Jews and blacks. The theme of the meeting, held at the BBC building, was "let's talk."

Toni Silberman, Ontario chair, League for Human Rights, said the good turnout – and the fact that there were mostly blacks in the audience – at the first meeting of its kind in years, heralded a renewal of the alliance between Jews and blacks which existed in Ontario in the '40s and '50s.

"The government has to listen when the coalition talks," said Alan Borovoy, Canadian Civil Liberties director, paraphrasing an old union song.

The audience broke into spontaneous applause when York University student Faye Rodzynek commented on the present situation by declaring, "We're mostly nowhere."

Alicia Dyson, a black York University student who will graduate as a teacher this year, said that "The dialogue between Jews, blacks, Asians and other minorities ends in the classroom. After that, everyone follows their own crowd."

"Jews hang out in one area, blacks in another, Asians in another," Rodzynek added. "I got extra attention because I was Jewish and white and taking a course in American black relations. Jews are exposed visually to other minorities but nothing else.

> Waiting to see what happens

"For many young Jews, their only exposure to blacks is through the media. The blacks and Jews are two separate communities. Today, young people do not see shared circumstances. I'm almost sad to say this to you. Where do we go from here?"

The only other spontaneous applause came when former Ontario NDP cabinet minister Zanana Akande, who is also a board member of Urban Alliance on Race Relations, said: "Unlike the United States where racism is overt, in Toronto we are dealing with shadows of racism which are harder to identify."

Arthur Downes and Morley Wolfe, who were on the meeting's steering committee, called for Jews and blacks to work together as they did in their days at Harbord Collegiate.

Akande said blacks are waiting to see what happens "after we extend the hand of friendship."

Pamela Appelt, a black activist, and Karen Mock, national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, were also on the steering committee.

They read from a list of suggestions from the audience, which included: more round tables like this; why did the two communities grow apart?; relate black history to a Jewish audience; social activities to bring the two communities together; ask the leaders of the black community to take part.

Other members of the steering committee included Gail Benick, Mel Crystal, Nola Kianza, Shelley Stillman, Norma Telfer and Sheldon Taylor.

SCHOOL SPIRIT: Junior high students at Associated Hebrew Schools Danilack campus with art teacher Paula Davies who spearheaded paper-mache pencil project. The students are competing in the Board of Jewish Education creative writing competitions.

UJA Federation offering new continuity grants

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Based on experience, Susan Jackson expects a flood of 300 to 500 grant applications this month.

The UJA Federation Action Committee for Jewish Continuity (ACJC) has announced its seventh grant round, with a March 31 deadline. It offers up to 10 grants of up to $5,000, and up to 10 grants of up to $2,500, for projects furthering Jewish continuity and Jewish identity.

After over four years as director of continuity, Jackson still speaks enthusiastically about her work. "It's brilliant, really," she said recently, referring to a grassroots project begun by six students at Bais Yaakov High School for Girls.

Their program, Ashreinu, ran an outreach initiative for Russian children. "The problem was that the cultural and language differences were difficult," explained Jackson.

"We funded them so they could bring in Russian teenagers and teach them to be Jewish youth leaders, so they could work with the kids."

The result: "A double bang for your buck."

But that's only part of the story. After the program was established successfully, organizers applied for a second grant, to run a family Shabbaton, because the Russian parents were interested in what their children were learning about Judaism.

The Shabbaton, which received the grant, was "a huge success," said Jackson. "It was small money, but look what happened."

Toronto's continuity initiative, funded annually with $300,000 from UJA Federation campaign, grew out of a local task force report on assimilation and intermarriage.

Through a variety of projects, covering the community spectrum "from the far, far right to the far, far left," ACJC tries to make it easy for people to access and feel part of the Jewish community, both through outreach and bolstering from within, explained Jackson. She works closely with a diverse 20-person committee chaired by Glennie Lindenberg.

"We're trying to balance the mandate... between funding 'non-traditional' groups with funding the existing organizations," said Lindenberg.

ACJC has funded 150 projects through six grant rounds. Its non-grant funding includes a three-year commitment to Israel Experience programs, now in its third year.

Among projects that have received grants are singles programs planned by the Bloor Jewish Community Centre and Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

One program even arose out of an exercise that was part of UJA Federation's Leadership Development program. Some of the participants became so enthused about their hypothetical grant proposal that they followed through on it and created a program for young adult children of interfaith marriages, which ran under the auspices of Jewish Campus Services.

"These grants encourage partnerships between groups and organizations in the city," said Jackson.

In this case, a number of the young adults were "funnelled" into Kolel's Taste of Judaism program, said Jackson."It was the perfect shidduch."

Brit milah focus of March conference

By LEILA SPEISMAN

TORONTO — Brit milah in the modern world will be the focus of a conference to be held on March 30 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The conference, titled Ritual Circumcision in the New Millennium – the Cutting Edge, will include both an afternoon session, geared towards mohellim and physicians, and an open public forum in the evening.

The afternoon program, which will run from 3:30 p.m. until 7:15 p.m., including dinner, will consist of three medical lectures – on infection, neo-natal jaundice and pain, with a response by Rabbi Moshe Tendler, professor of Talmud at Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary in New York, professor of biology at Yeshiva College and the Rabbi Isaac and Bella Tendler professor of Jewish medical ethics at Yeshiva University.

At 7:30, there will be a program on the topic for the general public.

Also taking part will be Rabbi Paysach Krohn, a mohel and noted speaker, and three Toronto physicians – Colin Geft, Manny Greenberg and Moshe Ipp.

Dr. Aaron Jesin, a Toronto physician and mohel who is an organizer of the program, said that the goal is "to convey the message that ritual circumcision, which has been a religious commandment for over 5,000 years, is still relevant."

New York rabbi searching for new ways to 'do synagogue'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Larry Hoffman has spent the last six years trying to find new ways of "doing synagogue."

A professor of liturgy at Hebrew Union College in New York, and a native of Kitchener, Ont., he is the co-founder of Synagogue 2000, a trans-denominational project aimed at helping synagogues enhance their appeal both for current congregants and non-affiliated Jews.

"Our project combines cutting-edge thinkers from all denominations who try to envision and implement the ideal synagogue as a moral and spiritual centre for the 21st century. Each denomination has different versions, but the ideas are the same," he said in a telephone interview from New York.

The seeds for Synagogue 2000 were planted six years ago, said Rabbi Hoffman, after he had what he thought would be a one-time meeting with Dr. Ron Wolfson, a Conservative educator at the University of Judaism in Los Angeles, who was planning to run a focus group about synagogues. "I thought I would consult with him for one hour, but we had such a meeting of the minds, that we decided to partner," said Rabbi Hoffman.

With an initial three-year grant – which was extended another three years – from the Nathan Cummings Foundation, Steven Spielberg's Righteous Persons Foundation, and the Shirley and Arthur Whizin Foundation, the pair gathered about 25 rabbis, cantors and lay people, who went on a retreat to plan responses to the challenges facing today's synagogues.

"Throughout history, synagogues have been ethnic enclaves, but ethnicity is becoming a thing of the past. Young people no longer remember eastern Europe. We have to figure out how to go beyond ethnicity, to spirituality," said Rabbi Hoffman.

Another challenge, he said, is to take synagogues beyond "pediatric Judaism. In the '50s and '60s, synagogues began to be child-centred; people often joined for their kids. They took them to [Hebrew school or youth services], and left. We need to go beyond that, and provide a model of adult Jewish growth."

They are also trying to reach synagogues that have become corporate in structure," he said. "We call them frequent-flyer synagogues. They send home so many flyers, that the members relate to the synagogue as if they were consumers of a product. Rabbis are often treated as CEOs, charged with packaging Judaism, and judged by the market share."

The challenge of Synagogue 2000, he said, is to help synagogues build genuine spiritual communities for adults and children in a post-ethnic era.

Rabbi Larry Hoffman

With offices in New York and Los Angeles, and with a staff of 11, the project runs conferences and does consulting on how to transform synagogues. "We would come to Toronto, for instance, and speak to synagogue leaders interested in moving in the direction we envision.

"We can help them develop funding in order to build a more spiritual community. Organization-development experts will work in consultation with the rabbis and staff of a synagogue that wants to begin thinking in a unique way."

The synagogue leaders would also come to a conference, he said, and learn about such things as making the service more compelling, involving new members, developing family education, and using space more intimately.

"In most synagogues, the sanctuary is so big, it is hard to see what is going on at the pulpit. The service needs to be personalized, so people feel the warmth. The rabbi can come off the bimah, congregants could say a personal prayer in English when they are called for an aliyah, and everyone should be encouraged to sing.

Ideas are the same

"The ambience of a synagogue can be changed by treating strangers like new friends. They should not be left standing alone at a kiddush, and someone should ask them their names as soon as they come in. They need to feel welcomed," he said.

The project, which has received "excellent feedback" began with 16 pilot sites across the United States in the first two years. As well, the team has worked with five synagogues in the Washington, D.C. area, and has begun a three-year project involving 11 synagogues in Denver, Colo. There are also plans to involve Detroit and New York.

"We have a broad vision, rooted in Judaism, but differing according to individual needs."

Hebrew U provides health training to foreign students

'Tremendous peace potential'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Israeli professor and two of his students, a Jordanian and a Palestinian, are all smiles in a symbolic picture shown recently to a Toronto audience.

Leon Epstein

The professor, Leon Epstein, is director of the Braun School of Public Health and Community Medicine of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem – Hadassah faculty of medicine.

The picture, he said in a recent Toronto lecture, indicates the "tremendous peace potential" in providing public health training to students from countries in need.

"We have had Palestinian students for the last 20 years, long before the peace process was even thought of," he said. Even during the intifadah, a Palestinian student – a dentist living in Beit Lechem – hosted staff and fellow students at a home party. The hospitality is reciprocal, Epstein noted.

Epstein, a native of South Africa who made aliyah in 1958, spoke last week on World-Wide Health: Issues and Impacts at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation under the auspices of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and Ve'Ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee.

Probably the greatest public health challenge anywhere is keeping people healthy, said Epstein. Among his school's programs is a master's in public health, offered in both English and Hebrew. The program's 500 graduates – doctors, nurses, dentists, lawyers and social workers – represent 70 countries, including China, Cyprus, Ghana, India, Nepal, Nigeria, Romania, Russia and Turkey.

Thailand and the Philippines, with 90 alumni, "don't need us any more," said Epstein. "We no longer get students from there."

Epstein said he often thinks that Israelis and others in developed countries "don't really appreciate what's happening in other places."

At a workshop the school ran last year in South Africa, Epstein learned that at a nearby mother and child-care centre, 64 percent of the expectant mothers were HIV positive.

"In 10 to 15 years, those mothers are going to be dead, and their children probably won't survive... This is probably as grave as the Great Plague of the Middle Ages that hit Europe and decimated the population."

In fact, a nurse attending the workshop came from a region in which 25,000 people had full-blown AIDS and said the most important aspect of public health there was palliative treatment of those patients.

In the former Soviet Union, a major problem is decreased life expectancy, Epstein said. "One of the major reasons is the rise of alcoholism, linked with the high rate of many chronic diseases and the breakdown of the public health system."

Other problems facing alumni of the public health school include an infant mortality rate in the Gaza Strip five times that of the Israeli Arab population. The Palestinian Health Authority has set up a school of health, whose dean is a graduate of the Hebrew University School of Public Health, he noted.

Epstein's students are educated to focus on the needs of their local populations. Today, with the advent of the Internet, the school is able to offer them ongoing support.

Kellerstein shares love of Yiddish with all

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Her Yiddish students like teacher Faye Kellerstein, a singer, musicologist and Yiddishist, so much, they decided to go public.

Faye Kellerstein

That's why they wrote a letter to Ethel Cooper, chair of the committee for Yiddish, thanking them for sending Kellerstein.

How many teachers get letters like that from their students?

For her part, Kellerstein said she is touched by the students' tribute, but says that it's her belief that teaching a language should be fun.

"And don't forget," she said, "that we have tea with lemon and cake at every class."

The unusual letter, signed by students Phil Halpern, Bill Katz, Marty Kravitz, Merle Kravitz, Joel Sake, Harvey Schwartz, Sandy Starkman and Fran Winer, notes that Kellerstein livens up her classes with group singing and odd bits of Yiddish history.

Initially, the Thornhill Yiddish class was held on Mondays in the homes of members. But now it is ensconed in the boardroom of the Jewish Child and Family Centre at the Promenade.

After the letter, the class almost doubled in size when a woman joined and brought her bowling league of nine members.

Kellerstein recently drew 400 to a recent concert at Beth Tzedec Synagogue, where she sang the songs of composer, Abraham Goldfaden.

Her intense interest in Yiddish rubs off on the students because her own life is so centred in the Jewish community.

Her husband, Dr. Martin Kellerstein, a dentist, is also a Yiddish speaker and an active volunteer. Her daughter, Rebecca, and her two sons, Jeremy and David, are no strangers to Yiddish in their own homes.

Her parents, Chaya and Feivel Zuker, of Toronto, inspired her love of Yiddish. Feivel still reads the Torah at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue and has done so for 40 years.

Kellerstein is planning to teach a course in Yiddish singing and interpretation for teens and people in their 20s.

Recently she attended a camp in the United States, sponsored by Rutgers University, where the students spoke only Yiddish.

More should be done in Toronto to interest young people in the Yiddish language, she feels, stating that Toronto is a few steps behind Montreal in this regard.

"It is about time that we had our own permanent Yiddish theatre troupe in Toronto."

100-year-old believes her benevolence extended life

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — It's not uncommon to see Dina Zbar, 100, helping other residents at the retirement centre where she lives.

She takes them to medical appointments – pushing wheel chairs when necessary, she helps operate the elevator and she brings meals to the floor for residents who are in frail health.

Zbar has spent close to three decades as a volunteer at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and she believes she has been rewarded with a long life for helping other people.

There's no other explanation as to why she has lived so long, she told The CJN in a recent interview.

"I did a lot of good things in my life. I think it's a blessing from God."

Zbar has been a resident at the Terrace, the retirement apartment that is part of Baycrest Centre, for 14 years. On the wall of her immaculate living room is a plaque from Baycrest honouring her for 25 years of volunteer work. Also on display is a three-dimensional picture given to her by Rabbi David Monson in recognition of her work at Baycrest.

Dina Zbar

Looking at Zbar dressed in a smart black pant suit, her long grey hair swept up in a bun, it's hard to believe that she is 100 years old. She walks without a cane, she takes no medications and she has never been in hospital, she said.

Her hearing and vision are not what they used to be, she said. "You're not the same at 100 as at 50."

Ten years ago, she took over the presidency of the Reform shul, one of the two shuls at the Terrace. The woman who started the shul didn't have anyone to carry on her work, Zbar explained. "She begged me on her deathbed to take it over. I come from an Orthodox background… The rabbi said, 'Take it over. You'll have a mitzvah.'"

Another woman has since become president, and Zbar promised to help her.

Zbar left Poland in 1929 with her husband and their only child, daughter Goldie Rush. Zbar's brother, a resident of Ottawa, sponsored the family to come to Canada. She said other members of her family – a brother and her in-laws – perished in the Holocaust.

The early years in Ottawa were difficult, she said, because her husband, an entrepreneurial person, didn't have a trade and could not conduct business without knowing English. "He was sorry he came."

She said her brother offered to give them money and told them things would improve in the second year.

The couple first had a lunch counter near the federal government offices. Later they ran a confectionery store which had a post office. Finding a postmaster for the site was difficult, and Canada Post recruited Zbar, offering to train her.

"In three days I knew everything. I didn't go to school. I didn't have any education.

"I was 10 years a postmaster and they said I was the best in Ottawa. Once I got used to it, I liked it. It was interesting. You meet all kinds of people."

The couple sold the business in 1967, but her husband died two years later. She described her 45 year marriage as a very happy one.

Zbar moved to Toronto shortly after her husband's death to be closer to her daughter and son-in law and their two children. She moved to the Terrace in in 1984. But her association with Baycrest Centre began some 15 years earlier when she started volunteering there. "I used to come every day. It was very interesting."

Zbar said turning 100 was not a great milestone in her life, but it garnered her media attention. She made the front page of the Toronto Star and she was featured in a special millennium issue of Saturday Night.

Her family made her a lovely party, she said, but the celebratory mood was marred by the sudden death of her son-in-law one week later.

Zbar said she has see many changes in the course of her life. She recalled that when she was growing up, there was no running water or toilet in the house; no car, just a horse and buggy; and all the clothes were washed by hand.

"It was a very hard life… There's been a lot of progress in the hundred years… a lot of improvement and big changes … Who knows what's going to be in the next hundred years?"

Reflections on my first trip to Israel

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

Before I left for Israel, I wrote about my fears. I feared that on my 10-day trip to the Jewish homeland, I would not feel emotionally or spiritually connected to the land. I feared that in this country I had heard so much about, a country that means so much to so many people, I would feel nothing.

As it turns out, there was not one pivotal, emotionally charged moment that I could point to and say "aha – that was where it all came together," but rather a series of moments that are special to me.

This was a journey of firsts – my first time in Israel and the first time 1,000 young Canadians travelled to Israel for free as part of Birthright Israel, an initiative launched by Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt.

For some, praying in the holy land was most meaningful. For others, it was touching the Western Wall, or even those first steps off the airplane, seeing Israel for the first time.

For me, what held the most meaning was seeing the sites, touching the sand, hearing the tales of our Jewish ancestors.

The following are small, encapsulated moments that bound together, made me realize the beauty of Israel, the rich and fascinating history of the Jewish people and the unique challenges facing today's Israelis:

The Judean Desert

We visited this desert on our first real day of touring and it was not at all the way I had pictured a desert. I pictured sand and flat land, but this desert was more rock than sand, more hills than flat land. It felt surreal to be in such a majestic and vast terrain, a beautiful place that actually looked like a movie set.

Our tour guide, Tuvia Book, led us to a stone fort, which, he said, was the very fort where the Maccabees fought the Romans in the Chanukah story.

Book asked each of us to pick our own spot and be silent for five minutes. This was one of my favourite parts of the trip. That five minutes, to me, was the greatest gift of all. The desert was serene – no traffic, no ringing phones, no background noise at all. It made me realize how little of this pure silence we have in Toronto, and at the same time, how much I crave it.

Apart from Israel's beauty and rich history, there is something very special about the feeling that if you close your eyes, if you squint hard enough, you can almost see people from biblical times – Isaac, Abraham, Leah, Rebecca – treading this ancient land.

Shabbat

On Saturday evening in Jerusalem, we went to the home of Rabbi Paul Freedman and his wife Nina for dinner and Havdalah. Something Nina Freedman said really made me think.

She spoke about how our decisions really do have an impact on future generations. She said it is up to us whether, in future decades, a group of young Jews from Canada would be sitting as we were, in Israel. To put this in context, she said it is up to us to decide whether our children will be Jewish and whether there will be a future generation of Jews.

Book expressed a similar sentiment later in the trip. He said we are a link to the future. We will decide whether the chain of Jewish history will break and end with us. We will decide whether this link continues, whether Judaism will be passed onto our children.

Qumran National Park

A Jewish sect known as the Essenes lived in this area on the north-western shore of the Dead Sea for 200 years, about 2,000 years ago. They left what we now call the Dead Sea Scrolls in the surrounding caves. The scrolls were discovered in 1947 by Bedouin shepherds.

At Qumran, we had a magnificent view of the Dead Sea and could see Jordan across the water. I thought of what it must have been like for the Essenes, living in the isolation of the mountains and devoting their lives to spirituality and to writing out scriptures.

Masada

We saw the remnants of the palace King Herod had built. We gathered around the western palace mosaic, made of a simple geometric pattern. This mosaic took the best of Roman culture, but instead of featuring idols, the Jewish touch of simplicity was added, Book said.

Trekking through the desert.

This was a lesson we could learn from, he said. We did not need to isolate ourselves from everyday culture as the Essenes did, cutting ourselves off from civilization. Rather, we could take the best of today's civilization and still hold on to and practise Judaism.

As we explored the ancient palace, Book told the intriguing tale of the Roman seige on Masada. The Zealots resisted the Roman attempt to capture Masada for months and built a wall to keep them out. But when the Romans set fire to this wall, the Jewish warriors realized there was no hope.

Their leader, Elazar Ben-Yair urged them to take their own lives as free men rather than live as slaves. "Let our wives die unabused, our children without knowledge of slavery," Ben-Yair said.

Yad Vashem

Perhaps the most emotional moment of the entire trip for me was the children's museum. When I saw all those faces – wide, bright eyes, shining smiles, cheerful expressions, I was somewhat shocked. These were not the faces I had pictured when I visualized children who perished in the Holocaust. I had thought of gloomy, dim, sunken faces. But these children looked so hopeful, so happy. One and a half million shining lights of hope extinguished in one bitter blow. As my eyes filled with tears, I clutched the arm of one of my fellow participants.

Mount Herzl Military Cemetery

Even though I could not understand the Hebrew on the tombstones, I could read the numbers, the ages on each tombstone – 19, 20, 21. Seeing these ages moved me. These soldiers, these young adults had barely experienced life. They would never feel the pleasure of watching their children grow up or see another exquisite Israeli sunset.

When you walk through the cemetery, you realize the seriousness of what is at stake for Israel. You realize the incredible human cost involved in defending the country.

The Concert

On our last night in Israel, we attended a concert given for all 1,000 Canadian Birthright participants. I looked around at the faces and marvelled at the fact that two people were generous enough to provide a trip to Israel for a group of people they did not even know.

***

Back in my North York apartment, I looked out at the flat, suburban land from my window. With a tinge of longing, I thought of the fact that I could not see Jerusalem or any part of Israel from my window.

I know with certainty that this was a trip and a magical country I will never forget.

Visible minorities take note

Ujjal Dosanjh is a first-generation Canadian of Indian origin. He is also an active member of the New Democratic Party government in British Columbia. As of this past weekend, Dosanjh is the new premier of B.C.

Indo-Canadians across the country have joyously taken his election victory as theirs – the penultimate validation of their acceptance into Canadian society. Other visible minorities have identified his victory as a sign of the growing legitimization of all new Canadians and recognition of their ability to make a contribution to public life.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Cynical observers offer a different analysis. Their conclusion is that in B.C., the New Democratic Party is finished – at least for the next provincial election or two. Few challengers stepped forward for the premier's job simply because they had no interest in being indelibly linked to a party whose re-election prospects are more virtual than reality!

Well, who's right? And more importantly, as my mother and yours would say, what does it mean for the Jews? Well, neither of the above assessments is right.

Dosanjh is the premier because he worked hard to get there. If it is true that in some respects his ethnic background has helped him, it is surely the case that it has also presented certain unique challenges, perhaps even obstacles.

Although he may be proud to belong to his particular ethnic and faith community, it is clear that he never sought public office, let alone the stewardship of a province, simply to promote Indo-Canadian identity. He, like a surprising number of politicians, genuinely wants to make a contribution. Nothing more and nothing less! And, to the extent his cultural background has helped shape his world-view, Dosanjh will call upon those values as he moves forward with whatever vision he has for British Columbia.

All visible minorities should take note of the B.C. experience. No doubt, pedigree still counts for a lot in some circles. However, in public life everything is up for grabs. At a time when ethnic Canadians statistically outnumber those who trace their roots to the first English and French settlers, origin counts for very little. Commitment and dedication, on the other hand, count for everything.

As to the significance for the Jewish community, there is a lesson to be learned... if only the student would enter the classroom.

Winnipeg CJA names campaign team

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The combined Jewish Appeal leadership for the 2000 (5761) campaign is much the same as last year's group.

Back to co-chair the campaign this year is businessman, Peter Leipsic.

"I am delighted with the broad-based support we received from all areas of the community last year," he says. "We have a wonderful organization and I hope we can further broaden our base. I am excited to be serving this year with Sandra and Marcia."

Marcia Cowan and Sandra Secter, Leipsic's co-chairs this year, were part of the management team behind last year's very successful campaign.

Secter is past chair of the CJA Women's Campaign and board member of numerous Jewish organizations including the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg. Cowan is immediate past president of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. She is also very active in the community.

Secter's successor as chair of the CJA Women's campaign is Sharon Wolchock, who is returning for a second term.

Wolchock is well known in the Jewish community, nationally and internationally. She was the two-term former national president of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, and is currently vice-president of the NCJW's international body.

The 1999-2000 women's campaign, she reports, raised about $700,000, a $20,000 increase over the year before.

Overall, the campaign raised over $3.4 million, 4 percent over the target of $3.25 million and close to $400,000 more than the year before. This year's goal is $4 million.

Rady JCC holds annual meeting

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Despite a drop in membership of close to 1,000 over the last year, the members of the board of the Rady Jewish Community Centre were in a celebratory mood at their annual general meeting late last month.

That is because revenues are up close to 20 percent – to $737, 114 – with revenues exceeding expenses by almost four times as much as the year before.

As well, executive director Hal Bordy points out, 5,000 membership units is still considerably better than the 800 or so in the last years of the old YMHA Jewish Community Centre downtown.

The old Y, located in a rundown area of downtown Winnipeg, was closed on June 30, 1997, when the Rady Centre was opened at the new Asper Jewish Community Campus in an affluent and largely Jewish residential area in south Winnipeg.

There has been some debate over the large non-Jewish membership of the Rady Centre in recent months. Bordy reports that the non-Jewish component is estimated to be about 40 percent.

There are some who feel that the centre should be open on most Jewish holidays to accommodate non-Jewish and unobservant Jewish members.

Bordy however emphasizes the importance of focusing on the "Jewish" in the Rady Jewish Community Centre. He and the board, he says, have no intention of watering down the facility's Jewish character, content or programming.

"We are considering developing a cultural membership for those who are not interested in using our health and fitness equipment and facilities," Bordy says. "That is the most expensive part of our operation. We would charge a lower fee for cultural memberships. I expect that we will introduce this by next fall."

Internet cannot replace written words: rabbis

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Technology will be a great tool in education by making information more accessible, but it will never replace the written word, a panel of three local rabbis concluded .

Rabbi Steven H. Garten of Temple Israel, Rabbi Ely Braun of Congregation Beth Shalom and Rabbi Dr. Reuven P. Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas recently took part in a program titled, The Written Word: The Book in Judaism, at the National Library of Canada. The afternoon was co-sponsored by the Council of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection which is dedicated to raising the profile of the collection of rare Jewish texts that were donated to the library by the late Lowy.

"The Jewish people, in their own miraculous way," said Rabbi Garten, "understood that only through making the written text available to the entire population – not just to the priests and not just to the kings – was the people and its traditions able to survive the calamities which would befall them."

He spoke of the great power of the written word in keeping the Jewish people together throughout the ages. "Placing words on the page gave them a power and a transportability that was unique…it is, I think, one of the great miracles of our survival as a people that the wisdom we think to be eternal was placed in books."

It is the combination of the written and oral traditions that is important in Judaism, Rabbi Bulka said. Without human interpretation and discussion, the book is not enough. "We are not the people of the book, we are the people of the word. It is the sanctity of the word that is in the book that gives the book its sanctity."

Although he is an enthusiastic user of the Internet for research and learning, Rabbi Braun cautioned that it cannot replace a book. "The value of looking at these ancient manuscripts is the value of being able to handle a text that has been handled by previous generations," he said.

Following a lively question and answer period, audience members were invited and urged by Susan Lightstone, a council member, to visit the Lowy collection which Rabbi Braun described as "a national treasure and a Judaic treasure."

Arts festival to show works of students, grads

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the film In November, 1943, a 90-year-old Jewish grandmother speaks about the cold, wintery night in World War II Poland when soldiers found her hiding in a house and she managed to escape.

"It is very personal, very intimate," says Jonas Bell Pasht, 20, a film student at Ryerson Polytechnic University.

Pasht says the film won a special jury award at The International Jewish Film and Video Competition in Berkeley, Calif. in October and was aired on HBO in May as part of a series on young filmmakers.

The four-day arts festival begins Sunday and will display the works of Toronto students and recent graduates.

At Monday night's film screening, a sketch comedy show called HypeTV will be aired. The show was directed, written and produced by Josh Tizel and three other radio and television arts (RTA) students in the spring of 1999 during Tizel's last year in Ryerson's RTA program.

The 10-minute show focuses on the trials and tribulations of the first-year university student.

Another sketch is a spoof of the television show Lifestyles of the Rich and the Famous and features a show called Lifestyles of the Hopelessly in Debt which includes a tour of a really messy dorm room.

The film screening, Monday night, will be followed by a question and answer period so that the audience can ask the filmmakers questions.

The first day of the festival will showcase photographs, paintings, sculptures, and other artistic works.

Tuesday night will feature instrumental and vocal music, while Wednesday will showcase a melange of theatre, dance, and the spoken word, including poetry, monologues and storytelling.

The festival will be held at the Poor Alex Theatre at the corner of Brunswick Avenue and Bloor Street West and was organized by students, recent graduates and Tamar Kagan, arts and culture coordinator for Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

Tickets are available at the JSU office at U of T or the JSF office at York University or can be obtained by calling 785-1465.

Teen marks her fourth bat mitzvah

By BARB SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — It is hard enough for most girls to get through one bat mitzvah – but Andra Roston, 15, just celebrated her fourth – well, sort of.

For the last three years, Andra has been chanting a Haftorah portion in February, at the Hebrew Beach Institute. Her bat mitzvah took place there in June 1997.

In a recent interview days before she delivered her Haftorah, the Grade 10 student at Malvern Collegiate in the Beaches, told The CJN she got so much satisfaction studying for her bat mitzvah that she wanted to do it again.

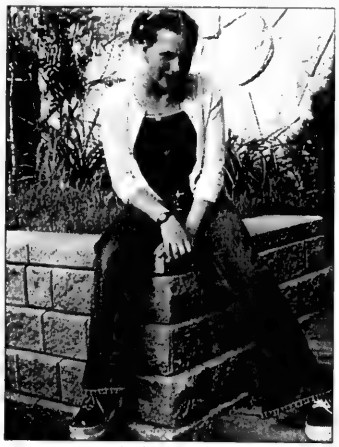
Chanting a new Haftorah every year is "like doing all the work for a bat mitzvah," she said. "On that day we have a special kiddush and my friends come back to my house for a special celebration."

One of only a handful of Jewish students at her school, Andra said she is very proud of her heritage.

"It doesn't bother me to be the only Jewish person around. I really love it. It makes me feel special. I can teach people about what Judaism is about."

Now that she's educated them, her friends are sensitive to the fact that she follows special dietary laws, she said.

"[They're] coming out to the synagogue to hear my Haftorah because they know it's really important to me and they want to support me."



Andra Roston

Andra's involvement with her synagogue began several months before her bat mitzvah, when she and her mother, Clair Fainer, began attending Shabbat services regularly, she said. "The only reason either of us started going to synagogue was because of my bat mitzvah.

"My mother said, 'I don't want to walk in there on the day of your bat mitzvah and feel like a stranger. We're going to go every two weeks.'"

Both mother and daughter have continued to attend very regularly, Andra added. "My mother goes every week.

"The synagogue has had a really big impact on me, especially after my bat mitzvah. When I go to synagogue, even though most people are at least 30 years older, they treat me like an equal. It's really nice for an adolescent girl to be treated like an adult."

Andra said she decided to do the annual Haftorah on her own. After she talked to her mother, the two of them approached the shul. "They said basically the same person does the Haftorah every week and it was nice to have a change.

"We found out what days people weren't having bar or bat mitzvahs …I tend to do them in February because most people don't have bar and bat mitzvahs in winter."

And she proudly noted that she is able to teach herself to chant the portions.

"I had a really terrific teacher when I studied for my bat mitzvah …She taught me how to read the notes. So now I can do it on my own. Sometimes I call her if I have trouble."

Andra said she regrets that she can't teach herself the Maftir portions, but she doesn't know how to read the notes in the Torah.

She admitted that she gets butterflies in her stomach before she recites the Haftorah. "I get a little nervous…It's always like that. But in the end I always pull it together.

"I feel relief that I've gotten through it, that I finished another Haftorah and I'm proud of myself …I plan to do one every year."

The Americans are trying to formulate an advance agreement on the main points of the settlement so that when the talks resume, they will focus on summing up the deal and not on time-consuming bargaining, as in the past.

The Israeli proposal to renew the talks was conveyed to Syria more than a month ago by Clinton in a telephone conversation with Syrian President Hafez al-Assad. According to the report that reached Jerusalem, Clinton said: "Suppose the Israelis were ready to talk to you about demarcating the June 4, 1967 lines. In that case, could you make your best effort to stop the shooting in Lebanon and bring a Lebanese delegation to the talks?"

Assad reportedly replied in the negative, saying that the Lebanon issue would be the last item on the agenda, after agreement was reached on the border. The Americans tried to convince Assad that if he continued to resist, Prime Minister Ehud Barak would decide on a unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon that would be detrimental to the peace process.

The United States is also pressing Syria to make a public goodwill gesture toward Barak in order to facilitate the prime minister's efforts to win over Israeli public opinion.

According to reports from the United States, there are now signs of a change in Assad's approach.

Israel and Syria are still divided over the exact formulation of the agreement to renew the talks. The Syrians are talking about "demarcation" on the ground, while the Israelis are speaking of "delineation" on a map. In last Sunday's cabinet meeting, Barak presented the essential positions he will insist on in an agreement with Syria:

• Early warning. "We need an early warning of dozens of hours in order to prevent a situation in which we will respond only when Syrian tanks have already crossed the border."

It is important, Barak said, for the United States to "give us the warning capabilities it has" – referring to satellite photos, among other technologies. These sophisticated methods would provide Israel with the early warning it now gets from the station on Mount Hermon.

• "Normalization first." Barak insists that the signs of normalization must be visible on the ground even before the evacuation of the settlements on the Golan Heights. There is a precedent for this in the peace treaty with Egypt, when embassies were opened in both countries after a partial withdrawal in Sinai and long before the evacuation of the salient Rafah settlements in Sinai.

• Security arrangements. Israel will demand that the demilitarized zones and the thinned-out areas must not be symmetrical, with deeper security arrangements on the Syrian side.

Spain gets out of Israel's way at UN

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Israel came a step closer to full participation at the United Nations when Spain dropped its objections to allowing the Jewish state to join the European regional bloc at the world body.

Spain became the last European Union country to drop its objections, U.S. Vice-President Al Gore told Jewish leaders Sunday.

"We welcome the news," Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice- chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, told JTA.

"This is an important step toward ending Israel's isolation at the UN. Its inclusion in a regional group will end an injustice of 50 years standing," Hoenlein said.

The process of Israel joining the United Nations' Western European and Others Group will still take some time because there are still other nations, including Canada, New Zealand and Malta, that have to weigh in.

Membership in a regional group is a prerequisite for joining important UN committees and the Security Council.

Of all UN members, Israel alone is ineligible to sit on the Security Council, while nations cited by the U.S. State Department for terrorism – including Iraq, North Korea and Syria – are eligible because they are members of regional groups.

Admission in a regional group requires consensus on the part of its standing membership: Not all members must approve the admission, but none can object.

Of the five regional groups at the United Nations, Israel geographically belongs to the Asian bloc, but members of that group – Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia and others – have consistently blocked Israel's entry.

Orthodox rabbis support prenuptial agreements

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A group of influential Orthodox rabbis has thrown its weight behind prenuptial agreements in an effort to persuade more young couples to sign such documents before they marry.

Eleven rashei yeshiva, or senior professors of Talmud, at the rabbinical school of Yeshiva University, have signed on to a statement urging greater use of pre-marriage agreements as "a critical step in purging our community of the distressful problem of the modern-day a gunah," or women "chained" to dead marriages by husbands who refuse to give them a religious divorce.

The prenuptial agreement, widely endorsed by centrist Orthodox authorities in 1994, commits a husband and wife to seek arbitration from a beit din, or religious court, in the event that they want to dissolve their marriage, and fines the husband a significant amount – usually $100 – for each day that he refuses to go.

Reform victory in Iran being watched closely

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telgraphic Agency

NEW YORK — American advocates for Iranian Jews welcomed the victory of reform candidates in Iran's elections, but are unclear whether it would lead to freedom for 13 Jews accused of espionage.

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, said the emergence of a relatively moderate Parliament after last Friday's vote removes the "excuses," Iranian President Mohammad Khatami had given for delaying the trial of the Jews.

The elections were seen as a contest between forces aligned with hard-line Islamic clerics, and those who want to see a loosening of strict enforcement of Islamic codes and an opening to the West. Many believe the arrest of the 13 Jews was part of that struggle.

The trial will test whether the relatively moderate forces truly support democracy and a civil society, or if their professions of moderation are "just a facade through which they carry out the same policies with a more gentle face but [with] the same consequences," Hoenlein added.

One American analyst said the elections would influence Iran in the long term, but is skeptical that in the short term they would benefit the 13 Jews, or have much impact on Iran's policies toward the West.

"The major levers of power – the armed forces, judiciary, electronic media, security and the main economic institutions – remain in the hands of the hard-liners," said Daniel Pipes, director of the Middle East Forum, a Philadelphia-based think tank.

He also noted that the Iranian view of reform and moderation may differ radically from the American perspective.

"What the sides are arguing about is the role of Islam, structures and personal freedom, but they're not talking about foreign policy issues," like weapons of mass destruction or sponsorship of international terrorism, he said.

Last month, shortly after Iranian authorities announced that a trial would be held soon, three Jews were released on bail. No date for the trial has been set. If convicted, the Jews would face the death penalty.

Sam Kermanian, secretary-general of the American Iranian Jewish Federation, said that over the long term, the election results will likely pave the way for "the implementation of the rule of law and a much fairer justice system."

But as for the issue of the 13 Jews awaiting trial, Kermanian said, "We hope that just as Iran had promised, they will make sure that all of the rights of the prisoners are preserved, and that once the review of their case is complete, Iranian judicial officials will indeed come to the conclusion that they are all innocent."

Pooya Dayanim, a spokesperson for the Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations, said his group is "very happy" with the results of the elections and that "more moderate and reform-minded people who care about the rule of law and pay attention to world opinion, are going to be in charge."

But Dayanim recommended taking a "wait-and-see attitude" concerning the 13, whose fate will be determined by Iran's judicial system.

Danyanim said he was pleased that Jews would have a new Parliament member, Maurice Motamed. Only one Jew is allowed to sit on this 290-member governmental body.

Incumbent Manouchehr Eliasi had been viewed as ineffective, said Dayanim, noting that Eliasi had been silent on the issue of the 13 Jews until just before the election, when he announced that he'd been promised the Jews would be released, which Iranian judicial authorities promptly denied.

By contrast, Motamed "is known for being a strong advocate of Jewish interests and doesn't play around with words or endear himself to the Iranian regime," said Dayanim.

Ali Fallahian, a former Iranian intelligence minister who was responsible for the Jews' arrest last year, was defeated in his bid for a Parliament seat.

Iranian Jews living in the United States have traditionally refrained from making public statements about the situation inside Iran.

Syria rejects confidence-building measures

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Syria, in its on-again, off-again talks with Israel, has been remarkably consistent in rejecting confidence-building measures as a means by which to convince Israelis that it is serious about peace.

Mideast Analysis

During both major phases of the negotiations, from 1992 to 1996 and again at two sessions in mid-December and early January, Syria has refused to embark on that road. Its perverse stance is counter-productive. It has made it harder for Israel's leaders to persuade Israelis that Israel should relinquish the Golan Heights in exchange for a peaceful settlement.

Itamar Rabinovich, Israel's former chief negotiator with Syria, was acutely aware of Syria's reluctance to engage in public diplomacy. "Our view was that when two parties had made a decision to seek an end to their conflict they should start the process of confidence-building during and as part of their negotiations," he writes in The Brink of Peace, published in 1998.

Hafez al-Assad, Syria's president, "totally rejected" this approach, Rabinovich adds. "As (he) saw it, no gestures must be made until the breakthrough occurs and an agreement in principle is reached."

In line with this philosophy, Assad has declined to participate directly in the talks. He has steadfastly rebuffed Israel's requests for face-to-face meetings, scoffing at suggestions that they could have a salutary effect on forging trust.

Assad's coldness was especially evident after Yitzhak Rabin's 1995 assassination, when he refused to send a message of condolence to Israel. And Syria's refusal to denounce Palestinian terrorist attacks in 1996 prompted Rabin's successor, Shimon Peres, to suspend the discussions altogether.

Uri Savir, who succeeded Rabinovich as Israel's chief negotiator on the Syrian track, has observed that the Syrians "could not bring themselves to forthrightly denounce violence against Israelis." As he put it in his 1998 book, The Process: "Their response...drove an emotional wedge between us and was... self-defeating from a Syrian point of view."

Syria's refusal to curb Hezbollah attacks in southern Lebanon has also left Israelis in a skeptical mood. Referring to this, Rabinovich noted, "There was not a clear and unambiguous message that Syria had made an irrevocable choice for peace with Israel." According to Savir, Israel erred in not insisting on a ceasefire in Lebanon while negotiations were in progress.

Israelis were also disappointed by Assad's refusal to meet Barak at the the last round of talks in the United States. But in what he regarded as a concession, he dispatched Farouk al-Sharaa – the foreign minister – in his place, the highest-ranking Syrian representative ever to enter into talks with Israel.

Sharaa, however, declined to shake hands with Barak, and his distant demeanour clearly sent a negative signal to those in Israel looking for even modest signs of a thaw in Syria's frigid attitude toward normalization.

Israelis were also disappointed by Syria's refusal to release the remains of Eli Cohen – the Israeli spy hanged in Damascus in 1965 – and to supply new information about Israeli soldiers missing in action in Lebanon since the 1982 war.

As in the past, Syria has done practically nothing to restrain Hezbollah. Since talks with Israel broke down in January, seven Israeli soldiers, as well as the deputy commander of the pro-Israel South Lebanon Army, have been killed in southern Lebanon. Recently, Barak announced that Israel would not return to the negotiating table unless Syria reins in Hezbollah.

And finally, the recent appearance of a harsh editorial in an official Syrian newspaper, in which Israel is accused of exaggerating the the Holocaust, reinforces the perception that Syria could not care less about public diplomacy, at least for now.

Lebanon pullout

The radio quoted Barak as saying that the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin told U.S. officials that Israel was willing to withdraw to the border that existed prior to the 1967 Six-Day War, depending on security arrangements with Damascus.

Barak said former Likud prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu also worked from the assumption that negotiations would be based on that border, but that nothing was ever concluded with Syria.

Amid the growing calls for a withdrawal, morale among Israeli soldiers serving in Lebanon has sunk to new lows. Several have told reporters that they do not want to be the last fatality in Lebanon before a withdrawal.

On Sunday, Israeli military officials jailed a soldier for four weeks for refusing to serve in southern Lebanon.

French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin prompted an outpouring of Arab criticism when he weighed in on the situation in Lebanon during a three-day visit over the weekend to Israel and the Palestinian self-rule areas.

After he described Hezbollah attacks on Israeli soldiers as "terrorist acts," Palestinian students pelted him with stones at Bir Zeit University in Ramallah on Saturday.

Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat later apologized for the incident.

On Sunday, thousands of angry Palestinian students in Hebron burned French flags and pictures of Jospin, whom they called on to "take off the mask and show that you're a Jew-man."

Orthodox feminist conference draws close to 2,000 people

By REBECCA NADLER
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — "An Orthodox feminist is not an oxymoron," said Belda Lindenbaum, co-chair of the Third International Conference on Feminism and Orthodoxy, at the opening plenary.

"We are not denying the tradition. We are striving for equal opportunity and dignity within Halachah," Lindenbaum added.

The two-day event drew almost 2,000 women and a few men from around the world last week. While many of the participants were uneasy about the label feminism, the delegates voiced an overwhelming desire to see changes in the role of women and the attitude toward them, within the context of Orthodox Judaism.

The conference at Grand Hyalt in New York City was organized by the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance (JOFA), whose goal is to expand the spiritual, ritual, intellectual and political opportunities for women, within the framework of Jewish law.

This year, the conference offered an expanded program, with sessions focused on family issues, ritual and prayer, new roles for women and text studies that dealt with specific halachic issues.

New to the conference were workshops geared to high school students. These included discussions of tzniut (modesty) and body image, Orthodox women on college campuses and synthesizing your Jewishness with career goals.

"This is an important program because there is a rapidly growing community of Orthodox high school students who have no forum outside school to address intellectual and leadership concerns," said Elizabeth Kilstein, the conference high school chair.

In addition, films about Jewish women and the issues they deal with were presented throughout the two days.

Many of the plenary sessions and workshops focused on the desire to find a balance between progress and tradition. "We are not angry women" noted one speaker. "We come to this process with love and reverence."

Many speakers noted the proliferation of Torah study opportunities for women. Whereas study for women was not encouraged 100 years ago, today Orthodox women across the spectrum are participating in Torah study.

Most participants agreed that the lives of Orthodox women have changed dramatically in the past 30 years. There has been an explosion in Jewish education for women, prayer groups and community involvement.

Three synagogues in the United States have created the position of synagogue interns, where scholarly women work with the congregation, teach, give sermons and fulfil a role similar to that of male rabbinic students who work as rabbinic interns.

In Israel, women have qualified to be toanot, female halachic experts who work as advocates in Israeli religious courts, and four women are now certified yoazot, advisors in Jewish law in issues relating to women.

Some changes have become almost universal. In all sectors of the community, bat mitzvah is now celebrated in some form – in some cases with a party where a dvar Torah is given, and in others with prayer service or a Torah reading.

One issue that united all the conference participants was the need to press Orthodox rabbis to find a solution to free the thousand of agunot, the women whose husbands refuse to give them a get or Jewish divorce.

Many Canadians attended the conference as both speakers and participants. Dr. Norma Baumel Joseph, a professor at Concordia University and a member of the conference planning committee, led a text study on women and the mitzvah of tallit, and spoke on the topic When is Change Not Change: Halachic Innovation or Application.

Rabbi Barry Gelman of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal, also a conference speaker, commented that the conference was "very impressive and positive. There is a tremendous resource of knowledge at this conference, and everybody has the opportunity to come away having learned a great deal from each other."

Shoshana Kagedan, a participant from Ottawa, came to the conference with her daughter Lila, a U of T student.

"I struggle to find an equilibrium in my life, and this conference gives me the opportunity to feel like one of many. Even with the variances, I feel a part of a community. It is especially inspiring to hear the different voices on the issues and to see the young women and the intensity which they approach their Judaism," Shoshana Kadegan said.

Toronto family honours Polish rescuers

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto family gathered in New York recently to pay tribute to those who helped save its matriarch and patriarch from certain death at the hands of the Nazis.

Dr. Aaron Jesin, his wife Sharon and several of their children, joined his parents, Isaac and Basia, to honor the Anishkewicz family, who rescued Basia, her brother and their parents by hiding them on their farm from 1942 to 1943.

In November 1942, Jeremiah and Sonia Slawin and their two children, Basia, then 13, and Israel, 11, escaped the Nazi liquidation of the ghetto in Dunilowicze (then in Poland), and fled into the nearby woods.

After being turned away from several homes, they were taken in by Celina Anishkewicz, a widow, and her two daughters, Wanda and Bolesia. The Jewish family first hid in a hole in the yard and after the cold set in, moved indoors, in a hole covered by floorboards.

Despite the meagre rations of the day, the Polish Catholics shared everything with the Jews, who feared for their lives with every knock on the door and every rustle outside. The windows of the house were covered up, and movements were kept to a minimum.

Had the Nazis discovered the ruse, everyone would have been shot on the spot.

With the arrival of spring in 1943, the Slawins moved on to other hiding places in the woods. But they never forgot their saviours.

Celina Anishkewicz died more than a decade ago and her daughter Bolesia, now 72, is in poor health. But the other daughter, Wanda, 75, traveled to New York with her daughter, Anne-Marie, for the gala event.

The Anishkewicz family was designated Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem in 1993. In New York, the family was honoured by the Jewish Foundation for the Righteous, which extends financial help to more than 1,600 aged and needy Christian rescuers in 28 countries, including three people in Canada.

Aaron Jesin, a Toronto physician and mohel, visited the Anishkewicz sisters in Belarus a few years ago. But his 96-year-old grandmother, Sonia, his mother, and uncle Israel were reunited in New York with Wanda Anishkewicz for the first time since the war.

Despite their poverty, the Anishkewicz sisters today tend, as best they can, to the cemetery where nearly 900 Jewish victims of the Dunilowicze massacre are buried. Only 73 Jews survived.

Jesin says that thanks to the life-saving daring and generosity of the Anishkewicz family, the Slawins survived and multiplied: Basia has six children, 23 grandchildren and one great-grandchild; while her brother has three children and seven grandchildren. And 96-year-old Sonia Slawin has lived to see it all.

Information is hardly ever neutral, he said. "Mr. Harris argues in the context of a particular political philosophy. I believe it to be in stark contrast to the outlook that shapes most women and men of faith. Political expedience and religious prophecy have been in conflict since biblical times."

Facts point in different direction

The task of prophecy, said Rabbi Marmur, is to act as a corrective to power. Without wishing to question the figures, we must continue to state the facts; they point in a very different direction.

"In view of the overwhelming support my original letter received from Jews and non-Jews alike, I believe that the spirit of prophecy is still alive in our midst. It may not impress those in power, but it does encourage us not to give up hope."

Rabbi Marmur is planning to send a reply to Harris' letter.

Keep the mole away from the baby

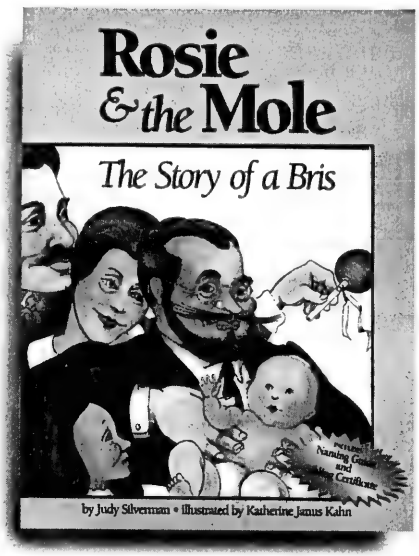
By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Grown-ups always think that when your mother and father bring home a new baby brother or sister, you should be thrilled.

Well, a lot of times, kids just aren't so happy. It sometimes seems as if the baby is more important than they are, and that everyone not only pays more attention to him (or her), but maybe even loves him more.

That's what Rosie thinks in the book Rosie & the Mole; the story of a bris, by Judy Silverman, with illustrations by Katherine Janus Kahn (Pitspopany Press, 1999).

The new baby in the house not only takes over Rosie's room, but her parents are making a big party for him, something called a bris. All the guests at the party seem to be ignoring Rosie.



When her aunt Pauline tells her that her parents made a big naming party for her when she was born, Rosie wants to know why she just had a naming party, while the baby is having a naming party and a bris.

She learns that the bris will be done by a mohel, but she thinks people are talking about a mole, an animal with huge claws that lives in tunnels. Rosie really gets nervous when her cousin Daniel, who seems to know a lot, pretends to agree with her!

A mohel (Rosie's mother explains to her that people "swallow the word mo-el and make it sound like mole") is the person who takes "a little bit of skin the baby doesn't need," which welcomes the boy as a member of the Jewish people. He also announces the baby's name.

When the "mole" arrives, all bundled up, with gloves on (hiding his claws, she thinks) and starts the ceremony, Rosie suddenly is afraid that he will hurt the baby – and she doesn't really want that to happen.

Rosie feels much better when her father reminds her that Sam, as they call the baby, is her baby too, and that it will be her responsibility to keep an eye on him and teach him, and "help him to be wonderful like you are."

Rosie & the Mole is a great book. It explains what a bris is, its importance, and how families celebrate it. There is a guide to Hebrew and English names for boys and for girls.

Girls, of course, don't have a bris. As aunt Pauline explains: "Girls don't need any special sign to be part of the Jewish people. We're born completely Jewish! All we're missing is a name."

One really special part of the book is a certificate for the baby's brother or sister, officially declaring that he or she is the greatest older brother or sister there ever was.

Twelve-year-old star takes her fame in stride

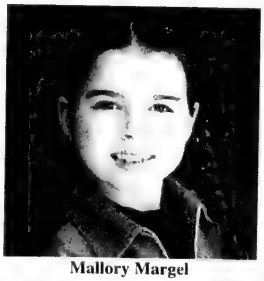
By SUZANNE WINTROB
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A 12-year-old local actor has caught the Hollywood bug.

Mallory Margel has already seen herself up on the silver screen, travelled to New York City, walked the red carpet and conducted the barrage of interviews that go with being a star.

"I like playing different characters with different problems," says Margel, a Grade 7 student with an infectious smile.

"Each character has its own story and so when I get into character, I can actually feel [that] I'm taking on the personality of somebody else."



Mallory Margel

For Superstar, a Paramount Pictures feature film released last fall, Margel took on the persona of a young Mary Katherine Gallagher, the nerdy Catholic schoolgirl played by Molly Shannon of Saturday Night Live fame. The audition was as odd as the character she played, Margel says.

"I had to smell my underarms and pray by a bed and say crazy things and do a lot of smooching in front of the camera," Margel says with a laugh.

She admits to "freaking out" when she saw herself on the big screen for the first time.

"After seeing the movie seven times, I still couldn't believe it was me. I looked so geeky that even my friends couldn't believe it was me."

But nothing was more exciting for the bubbly young actor than going to New York City for the movie's premiere.

"It was a magnificent feeling," Margel says. "There are a million cameras filming you. When I walked down the red carpet, I felt just like a princess."

Margel envisions many more red carpets in her future, since she intends to pursue an acting career. In only two years, she has amassed quite a list of television, film and stage credits, including about a dozen national and international commercials, a steady spot on Sharon, Lois and Bram's Skinnamarink TV, and an appearance in a Shawn Colvin music video.

Her latest commercial, an action/adventure-type for a cereal, is set to air next month.

Margel will soon be seen opposite Jo Beth Williams, Colm Fiore and Jonathan Jackson in the ABC Television made-for-TV movie Trapped in a Purple Haze. The family drama filmed in Toronto tells the story of a family's struggle to deal with heroin addiction.

When she's not working, Margel is like most other kids. She loves singing and dancing, baseball and swimming, cycling and ice skating. She lives in a comfortable house with her parents Debby and Jerry and her 15-year-old brother Ryan, and goes to school like everybody else.

"Nobody treats me differently and I wouldn't want them to," she says.

But when she's in acting mode, Margel wakes up extra early, has her mom drive her to work, gets into costume and character, and waits for her moment in the spotlight.

Sometimes she does her homework on the set or in her trailer. If a shoot last more than three days, a tutor studies with her so that she doesn't miss too much schoolwork.

Shari Quallenberg of Talent Vision, Margel's agent, says the fact that Margel is a tad small for her age has expanded her opportunities significantly – she is able to play younger characters while exuding the confidence and maturity of an older child.

"Acting is really hard, but if you really like it then you should stick to it," advises Margel, whose dream is to work with Natalie Portman, the young actor who played Queen Amidala in Star Wars Episode One: The Phantom Menace.

"Definitely don't do it for the money. Don't do it if your parents push you into it. You can't take rejection seriously because it can take a while to get started. You can't get upset. And you can't think of yourself as so great."

Actor enjoys multi-faceted career

BY KATHRYN KATES

TORONTO — As a child, John Rubinstein had the pleasure of witnessing his internationally renowned pianist father, the late Arthur Rubinstein, plying his great talents at recording sessions and on the world's finest concert stages.

From the toddler's early years in Los Angeles, to his school days in New York City, it is not surprising that at 53, his exposure to the arts has culminated in making him a multi-faceted award-winning actor, singer, dancer, musician, composer and director in theatre, film and television.

Toronto theatregoers can catch Rubinstein currently on stage till April 1 at The Royal Alexandra Theatre, co-starring with Donald Sutherland, in playwright Eric-Emmanuel Schmitt's Enigma Variations. This English debut adaptation, by Sutherland's son Roeg is Broadway bound. Rubinstein portrays journalist Erik Larson.

MUSEUM ACQUIRES RARE GAUGUIN PAINTING

French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin was scheduled to officially present to the Israel Museum last week the painting Landscape with Dog, a rare late work by the French artist Paul Gauguin.

The painting, created during the last months of Gauguin's life, is a bequest of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Kahn-Sriber of Paris.

Landscape with Dog is the Israel Museum's fifth Gauguin painting, and comprises a late representation of his Tahitian period.

"The Museum is most gratified to receive this important addition to its holdings of the work of Gauguin," said museum director James Snyder.

The Kahn-Sribers donated the painting in memory of Amnon Ben-Natan, the son of the former Israeli ambassador to France who died in the Yom Kippur War.

Capsule Review: Eliezer Segal, a professor at the University of Calgary, seems to be blessed with an irrepressible erudition that has blossomed into a series of engaging newspaper columns on diverse subjects related to Jewish history, learning and lore.

Western Canadians may be familiar with his articles which have been carried in the Jewish Free Press for the past decade, and in the Jewish Star before that. For the rest of us, Segal's short, lively essays are available in a new anthology, Why Didn't I Learn This in Hebrew School?, recently released by the American publishing house Jason Aronson Inc.

The collection shows a well-developed imagination and a great sense of fun and frivolity. Segal conducts a free-roving examination of a multitude of subjects that are by turns weighty and trivial, obvious and arcane, but always intriguing.

In just a few minutes I learned that the British detective writer Sir Arthur Conan Doyle penned a story on the missing breastplate of the Jews, and that a lunar crater was named after Levi ben Gershom, the 14th-century French rabbi also known as Ralbag. Other topics include the Talmud's attitudes towards weight loss and free trade, how medieval synagogues attempted to attract worshippers, and whether Maimonides could have joined the Mounties.

A hardcover volume of 368 pages is available in Canada. Segal, who is originally from Montreal, also maintains an impressive Web site at www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~gal/#.

Actor enjoys working with Donald Sutherland in Enigma Variations

at his island hideaway off the coast of Norway," says Rubinstein. "It turns out that the two of us have many secrets that come together and are revealed."

Enigma Variations takes its title from a work by English composer Sir Edward Elgar. "In fact that piece of music is spoken about and is one of the elements of the story that link the two men together," he says. "I actually do sit at the piano and perform tiny excerpts of it during the play."

Of his work with Sutherland, Rubinstein says, "It is daunting and terribly satisfying to do this two character play opposite Donald Sutherland. This wonderful brand of play offers a special kind of give and take on the stage. I've always loved him, it is a great honour for me and we're having a lot of fun."

John Rubinstein

As a child, his parents' appreciation for theatre and the movies was contagious and by the age of 13, he was determined to become an actor, lending his talents to school and amateur productions.

During his freshman year, while studying theatre and honing his composing skills at UCLA, he won his first professional role alongside Howard Keel in Camelot. Shortly thereafter, his first of over 100 musical scores was commissioned.

His career has flourished and he has won a number of awards, including a best actor Tony Award for Children of a Lesser God. He also wowed Broadway audiences in Pippin, Love Letters, Hurlyburly, M. Butterfly and Ragtime.

He has acted and directed both off-Broadway and regional theatres across America. Rubinstein's film credits include Someone To Watch Over Me, Daniel and Another Stakeout.

He has appeared in numerous television shows including Crazy Like A Fox, The Two Mrs. Grenvilles, Roots: The Next Generation, and more than 150 movies of the week and series episodes.

Television viewers may remember him for his Emmy Award nomination as Jeff Maitland in the Aaron Spelling/Mike Nichols '70s series, Family. His recurring role as a divorced father of a young child led to controversial story lines for the times.

"I feel blessed that my life has been able to encompass careers – that though they are all somewhere in show business, they have covered a lot of different angles of it. I relish that diversity," he says.

"You like it when it's good. It's much more fun to do a really good play than a bad movie. Sometimes, you can say, as many do – 'Well, the bad movie is bad, but I'm making 20 times more money making it, than to do a really good play, during which I go broke.'"

He is happily married since 1992 to actress Jane Lanier, known to Toronto audiences for her starring role in Fosse. They have two sons Peter, 6, and Jacob, 3. Rubinstein has two older children, Jessica and Michael, who followed him into the family business.

"You can call me a professional actor, composer and director, but I'm mostly a professional father. I don't get a lot of spare time, but when I do, it's mostly spent with the kids and my wife," he says.

Rubinstein enjoys riding bikes with his children. He and his eldest son partake in bicycle expeditions to various scenic locales around the United States.

He proudly admits that he has brainwashed his kids about his love for playing baseball and feels it worked on his two oldest, who can really swing a bat. He's currently working on his little ones' baseball skills.

Artist uses deep religious beliefs as creative muse

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA—At the urging of a number of Toronto art afficionados, Ottawa rabbi and artist Elie Benzaquen will be showing his works in Toronto, at the Village Shul, on March 12 and 13.

Rabbi Benzaquen has successfully carved a niche for himself in the world of art and uses his background and deep religious beliefs as the basis for his creativity.

Born in England into an artistic family of Moroccan heritage, Rabbi Benzaquen has studied in New York, Venezuela, Montreal and Ottawa.

He has studied computer graphics and has apprenticed with the Italian glass master Gianni Tosso whose works are regularly featured at Christies Auction House.

The combination of Torah study and art come naturally to Rabbi Benzaquen who is also a scribe. His father and five uncles are respected rabbis and scribes and his mother crafted religious head coverings for women and sacramental objects.

"I was trained to be a rabbi," he says, "but I always knew that that was not the path I would follow. My art is my pulpit - not that I want to preach, but that I want to inspire."

His artistic talent manifested itself at an early age. "Even as a youngster at yeshiva," he says, "I used to go to museums." In his early 20s, Benzaquen decided to follow his heart and pursue his dreams.

"I decided to break free of the strict religious path that had been imposed upon me during my childhood and chose to follow a more humane and joyful way of life," he says.

"I truly believe that G-d wants me to use my abilities to their utmost and share them with the world at large."

Working primarily in charcoal and oils, Rabbi Benzaquen brings to life the objects and people he creates.

"My current body of work emphasizes both the contemporary and the traditional aspects of Jewish life today," Rabbi Benzaquen says.

"Living Jewishly means to me that one can live a fully enjoyable and modern lifestyle and yet remain connected and bound with the ancient tradition that is the Torah way of life. There is no dichotomy; both can work in synthesis and harmony."

The show runs March 12 and 13 at The Village Shul 1072 Eglinton Ave. W., from 11 a.m. to 8 p.m. There will be a silent auction on March 12 at 7 p.m.

Rabbi Benzaquen's art emphasizes "the contemporary and the traditional asects of Jewish life today." They're on display in Toronto March 12 and 13.

Israeli pop star dead at 41

By HAIM SHADMI
Ha'aretz Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Singer Ofra Haza, Israel's most successful international pop singing star, died Feb. 23 at Tel Hashomer hospital at the age of 41.

Hospital authorities declared her dead at 19:40, but refused to comment on the medical reason for her hospitalization.

During most of her 13 day stay at hospital, she was treated in the intensive care unit where she lay unconscious, receiving intravenous drug infusions and dialysis treatment. The original report of her hospitalization said that a bout of the flu had turned into a severe case of pneumonia.

Her condition had been critical but stable, but then she took a turn for the worse. Her liver functions deteriorated and foiled the advanced medical treatment which kept her alive for more than a week.

Haza's personal manager and close friend, Bezalel Aloni, said "this is a terrible tragedy. I will ask myself for many years how it came to this."

Haza, one of eight children from a Yemenite family, emerged as a pop star with a 1979 hit, I'm a Bimbo, but by 1985 she was combining traditional Yemenite tunes with 1980s pop, winning wider audiences for her music.

The release of the hit song Im Ninalu, in English, made her an international star by the late 1980s, selling as many as 15,000 copies a day and topping European charts. Haza also recorded with American singer Paula Abdul and sang on the soundtrack from the movie The Prince of Egypt.

An intensely private person, she kept her non-professional life out of the public eye, including her 1998 marriage to businessman Doron Ashkenazi.

A TORONTONIAN'S VIEW OF MONTREAL

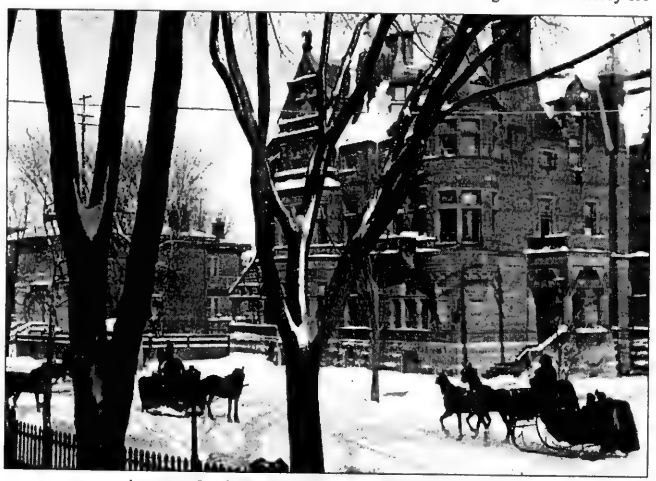
TRAVEL TALK
BY BILL GLADSTONE

Snow was gently falling as I boarded the train at Toronto's Union Station for VIA Rail's recently-introduced overnight sleeper car service to Montreal. Before long I was sipping a drink and engaged in conversation with a fellow passenger in the glass-roofed dome car.

"What is it about Toronto? They're such amateurs when it comes to clearing snow. The streets are always so messy after a snowfall. Not like Montreal."

I am a born-and-bred Torontonian, and this got my back up.

"On the contrary," I said. "We take snow very seriously. Don't you remember that Mayor Mel Lastman called in the army after the great snowfall of '99?"



A snowy day in Montreal from the McCord Museum.

This brought a dismissive smile and a sorry shake of the head, and I realized too late that it was the wrong thing to have said.

"The army! We had the Great Ice Storm and nobody called in the army until at least a week later. In Montreal we know how to handle snow."

During the night, I raised the blind in my cosy single berth and saw snow swirling elegantly as in a glass paperweight. Soft as cotton, the white stuff blanketed the tracks parallel to our own and muffled our rhythmic locomotion.

After arriving at Gare Centrale at 8 a.m., I traversed a series of passageways to the Hilton Bonaventure. Not until I reached my room, which stood many stories above the street, did I fully comprehend that the city had become a vast snowscape. Peel Street was whited out as it stretched towards the dim silhouette of Mount Royal.

Still, our city tour proceeded as scheduled, taking in Ste-Catherine and Sherbrooke Streets, the Old City, the Atwater Market, the antique shops along Notre Dame and other sites. The bus made it up the crest to St. Joseph's Oratory, even up the mountain along Cote des Neiges, although the weather greatly subdued the usual panoramic view.

"Each snowstorm costs the city $8 million," Francine, our tour guide, said. "We start clearing the snow right away here, we don't wait until it stops. And you notice that we put our parking meters away from the curbs, often right up against the buildings, so they don't obstruct the plows. Not like some Canadian cities."

At the McCord Museum (600 Sherbrooke W.) an intriguing exhibit titled, Simply Montreal, displays many old-fashioned artifacts of winter, including mittens, scarves, skates, snowshoes, and models of pot-bellied stoves and horse-drawn sleighs.

Historic photographs show natural ice-bridges spanning the St. Lawrence, so-called "ice shoves," taller than buildings, that the river has pushed onto streets along the harbour, and the glorious six-storey Ice Palace of 1877, which was "by day, a house of alabaster (and) by night a giant lantern."

Montreal, according to the McCord, mobilizes an armada of 160 snowplows, 210 sidewalk plows and 110 snowblowers to clear an annual total of 7.5 million cubic feet of snow. The city is truly geared for winter.

Over the next three days, whenever I left the extensive underground network of interconnected malls and buildings, I found the sidewalks in clean and passable condition, and much of the above-mentioned armada busy at work. And still the snow kept falling.

Back at the Hilton Bonaventure, I decided to do what most Montrealers do – take winter in stride. What better way than to enjoy a swim in the (mostly) outdoor rooftop pool?

Snowbanks had gathered on all sides, and a profuse steamy fog was rising from the well-heated water. With snow falling on rooftop cedars and dancing around neighbouring office towers, I snuggled into the water's womblike warmth and happily, joyously, let the snow fall on my head.

Bill Gladstone visited Montreal as a guest of Tourisme Montreal.

Business Profile

Novator a leader in shop-at-home services

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Mark Fox started Novator Systems, an e-retail software and services company, he did not quit his day job.

Seven years later, Novator, which specializes in full-service shopping sites, has 40 employees, and has experienced consistent triple-digit growth over the past three years.

In May, Novator is planning to move out of its current 4,000 square foot space, to a space double its size, on Richmond Street West. They have tripled the number of employees in the last 12 months, and they expect to double or triple that number again in the next 12 months.

"We started the company as an opportunity for my wife to work out of our home while the kids were young," said Fox from his office, headquartered in downtown Toronto. "It was based on an idea I had been sitting on for awhile – selling flowers over the Internet. I had a vision of people wanting to shop from their home. We put together a business plan, focused on building a company that would provide that service."

Fox, 47, who has a PhD in computer science from Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh, is a former professor at the university, and is now on a two-year leave from a faculty position at the University of Toronto. While at Carnegie Mellon, he started up the Carnegie Group, a computer research company specializing in intelligent systems for solving engineering, manufacturing and telecommunications problems, which he eventually took public, and sold in 1998.

When he approached FTD florists with his idea, he says, "they were intrigued, but they did not think the Internet was important. I offered to design, operate and build a site for free, and charge them 15 percent of every sale. That was the beginning of FTD.com, probably the first e-retail company in Canada.

"It was a brand that marketed itself. There was not a whole lot of competition at that time, and Internet savvy people knew to type FTD.com.

"FTD, however, did not pay much attention to the site until the latter part of '97, when they began putting the URL in their print and television advertising. They even included the URL on their float in the Rose Bowl Parade."

Business increased annually, he said, and in 1999 they recorded 20 million visitors to the FTD site. "That worked out to one million orders worldwide, in 1999."

Recently, FTD awarded Novator a contract to expand the number of North American florists participating in the FTD Florist Online, from 3,200 to 16,000. "This expansion makes FTD Florist Online one of the largest specialty services retail malls in the world, enabling customers to select a florist in Canada or the United States by city, province or state, or by postal or zip code," says Fox.

It is an important marketing vehicle for FTD florists, he said. "Most florists advertise their site locally, but this site expands their market reach to any potential customer on the Internet around the world, allowing them to be accessible 24 hours a day, seven days a week."

The Web site enables customers to purchase flowers online, customize the greeting, select from a database of 500 messages, or arrange to have personal reminders sent to them regarding birthdays and other occasions. The site automatically sends the order through the FTD network, which consists of about 52,000 florists in 140 countries, and places it into the florist's operational computer ordering system.

Customers can call a toll-free number or e-mail FTD if they encounter problems with their order, and clients are provided with software that enables them to automatically respond to customer inquiries. "If customers get stuck, they can turn to the live, Net-based customer service agents," he says.

In Canada, three percent of FTD orders are done online, says Fox. "I'm looking ahead to when more and more people will be connected, and will be more comfortable shopping that way. Currently, a lot of people do research, but their ultimate purchase is done in a store. There are a lot of products people can buy without trying them out first. There is no reason they cannot buy them over the Internet."

Mark Fox

Confidence in Internet shopping is building, says Fox. "For Mother's Day in 1996, the peak order day was the Tuesday before. Now, the peak order day is Friday, because shoppers are confident that the order will arrive on time.

"Shoppers' attitudes are changing. That will catch up in Canada."

Although FTD is still a major account, Novator now lists Sony, Canada Life, Altavista Canada and Baskits among their clients, and the company has entered a strategic partnership with AOL Canada.

"In early '99, AOL Canada did a survey of e-retail providers, and based on what we have done, chose to work with us in order to help Canadian companies integrate e-commerce into their business plans.

"It's a win-win partnership for both of us. They selected us because of our best-of-breed services and technology, and the relationship also allows us to build a key distribution channel for our e-retail services.

AOL recommends Novator when a retailer applies to do e-retail, and "we provide engineering and design solutions, and guide them in developing and managing their Web sites," says Fox.

Uniquely Canada, launched last spring, is a Web site designed by Novator and marketed by AOL Canada, featuring Canadian gifts. "Orders increased about 20-fold by the holiday season," he says.

Novator clients, says Fox, "can virtually sit back and take orders. We provide the strategy – what they should be doing from a business and consumer perspective – and we consult with them on what products to sell, and what the value is to the consumer. We occupy a unique niche in the marketplace."

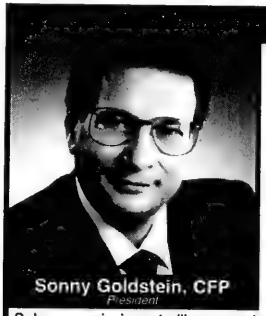
Software provided includes the Virtual Retailer, which supports sites with multiple currencies and languages, order processing, merchant editing of all Web site information, and report generation.

The Intelligent Agent interacts with customers to answer their questions, provide advice, guide them while shopping, and remind them of occasions and related products to purchase online.

"We provide people with peace of mind. Clients do not have to worry about the computer part at all, if that is what suits them. We can send them orders in whatever method they desire. Basically, they do not even need a computer," says Fox.

He sees the world changing in the next two or three years. "We will have super-computers in our homes, with 3-D capabilities and high-speed access. A combination of these things will result in a whole new way of interaction.

"Imagine what shopping will be like when shoppers are able to move around in a 3-dimensional world."



Sonny Goldstein, CFP
President

Prevention key to developing healthy bones

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prevention is where it's at in the treatment and management of osteoporosis, says a rheumatologist at Women's College Hospital.

Women today, spend about one-third of their life in menopause, so they have to be more aware than ever of the risks of osteoporosis," said Gillian Hawker, an associate professor of medicine at the University of Toronto, and director of WCH's osteoporosis clinical research program.

Osteoporosis, a thinning of connectors between the bones, causes bones to be fragile and more susceptible to crushing under stress, said Hawker. "It does not produce any symptoms, which is why it is called the silent thief."

Hawker, who was speaking at Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's recent Women for Women breakfast, said that peak bone mass is reached around puberty, and remains stable until menopause. About 20 percent of women then experience rapid bone loss. "At age 50, one in four women have reduced bone density. By age 70, one in two have experienced fractures due to osteoporosis. It is critical, therefore, to try and develop bones early in life."

Older women, who have a propensity to fall, increase their risk of fractures, Hawker said. "The number one focus should be on fall prevention, and it is critical to diagnose osteoporosis before the first fracture, because once a fracture has occurred, the incidence of further fractures increases exponentially."

Poor vision or poor balance – anything that throws them off – could cause a fall, she said. "An occupational therapist can come into a home and prepare a safety evaluation. Things such as cords or loose carpets can cause a fall."

Peak bone mass depends on a variety of factors including genetics, nutrition, and lifestyle factors including smoking, alcohol consumption and exercise, she said.

Hawker said that women who do weight-bearing exercises tend to have a higher bone mass. "In order to avoid the risks of reduced bone density, it is wise to keep alcohol and caffeine consumption down to two glasses a day each. Smokers also have earlier menopause, so their risk of osteoporosis increases."

Diet, exercise and lifestyle modification can slow bone loss in the rapid period, but not stop it, she said. "In older people, however, it can stop bone loss. It is essential, then, to put exercise into your daily routine."

Calcium is also important to maintain peak bone mass, said Hawker. "A post-menopausal woman does not hold calcium as well as younger women, and a vitamin D deficiency is common. Estrogen should also be considered for all women at risk, unless it is contra-indicated. Long-term estrogen therapy is necessary for maximum benefits."

Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's Women for Women campaign raises money to support projects in Israel such as Nahalal Youth Village and Agricultural School, Hadassim Children and Youth Village, hotlines and shelters for battered women and a rape crisis centre.

In Toronto, the campaign helps support such projects as the ASTEH-Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing and the North York Women's Shelter. The 1999-2000 campaign chair is Janice Haydu.

Vegetarian group explores Judaism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tom Salsberg would like us all to be VIPs – vegetarian inclined people.

Salsberg is president of L'Chaim, a new vegetarian group that meets monthly to socialize and learn more about vegetarianism.

Tom Salsberg

The group, which started up in June, has about 20 members. The lunch-time gatherings have attracted about 10 people. They come to socialize and to study a portion of the book, Judaism and Vegetarianism by Richard Schwartz.

There are also discussion groups on related topics which include: Judaism, vegetarianism and health; Judaism, vegetarianism and peace; involving the Jewish community re vegetarianism; vegetarian connections to the Jewish holidays.

The group also is planning various projects such as a vegetarian food drive.

Salsberg, who describes himself as 99 percent vegan, does not eat animals or products from the flesh of animals. "Vegetarianism is the diet that God prefers. We believe it is more ethical not to treat animals as slaves or as food.

"Animals are our fellow creatures, and they were created with the power to feel suffering. It is wrong to bring them suffering, directly or indirectly.

"I don't eat eggs, dairy products or honey because they are the fruits of animals. The way these items are brought to the marketplace, usually involves some type of cruelty."

Salsberg says his diet consists mainly of fruits, vegetables, grains, legumes, nuts, seeds, and the foods derived from them; he also eats pasta and bread, and drinks soy and rice milk.

According to Schwartz, the Hebrew term nefesh chayah (living soul) was applied in Genesis to animals as well as people. In his book he writes: "Moses and King David were deemed suitable for leadership because of their compassionate treatment of sheep in their care, and Rebecca was judged suitable as Isaac's wife because of her kindness in watering the 10 camels of Eliezer."

Worldwide hunger is related to animal-based diets, Schwartz says in his book. "One important reason why many [children] are starving today is that tremendous amounts of grains are used to fatten animals for slaughter. Meat-centred diets are very wasteful of grain, land, water, fuel and fertilizer.

"A meat-centred diet requires about 17 times the land area per person than would be required for a purely vegetarian diet. Animal agriculture also requires tremendous inputs of chemical fertilizer and pesticides, irrigation water, and fuel – commodities which are becoming very scarce worldwide."

Mount Sinai adds acupuncture

By BEN ROSE
CJN Reporter

An acupuncture clinic will soon be opened at the centre to treat migraine and facial pain, the audience at a Healthy Living series talk sponsored by the hospital at the Leah Posluns Theatre was told recently.

Though acupuncture may not be the "magic bullet" to ease migraine headaches or facial pains, Dr. Adam Chen said, "the east, with 5,000 years of Chinese medicine, and the west must work together."

Chen, a Wasser Centre staffer, gave details of two cases where acupuncture had helped patients. In one case, a 42-year-old male, who had been taking 15 pills daily to ease pain, was down to two to four pills daily after 10 sessions. In the other case, a woman had significantly fewer pain sessions after treatment.

Acupuncture is one of the treatments that has been added to the arsenal used by the 18 specialists at the centre.

Other treatments for migraines include a new group of drugs related to risatriptrin, Gordon said.

They "are a major advance," he said, but should not be given to people with heart problems.

Migraines are so debilitating they can destroy a life, he said, pointing out that migraines are three times more common among women than men. One in every nine Americans is subject to it.

Sixty percent of people with migraines get a warning that they will soon have pain, Gordon said, adding that where possible, they should avoid "triggers" (that may set off their migraine).

In response to a query to the audience by Dr. Michael Goldberg, a dentist, one-quarter of those in attendance said they have problems with their jaws.

A $100 registration fee not covered by OHIP is charged to each patient who comes to the centre, but care co-ordinator Marilyn Galonski said those who cannot afford it do not have to pay. The hospital does not provide any money to run the centre, but she said donations help keep it operating.

Patients must be medically stable to be accepted, she said, and the patient's doctor must agree to be part of the treatment team.

Since July 1999, 750 cases have been referred to the centre, and 250 of them have been assessed. Most of those are in the intake process, Galonski said.

The forum was co-sponsored by the Bathurst Jewish Centre and the Jewish Women's Federation. Lorne Saxberg was moderator.

Quebec native a natural on hoops court

By SCOTT GRANOWITZ
Special to The CJN

HOUSTON — Alex Bougaieff is a rarity in more ways than one. He stands 6 foot 11. He plays major college basketball in the NCAA. He hails from Trois Rivières, Que. And he also happens to be Jewish. That's right, a Jewish centre playing for Rice University in the Western Athletic Conference (WAC).

How did someone from a hockey hotbed get his start in hoops?

"I started in the eighth grade. I was tall for my age," explained Bougaieff (pronounced Boo-guy-eff). "I've always been very tall for my age, so the natural thing was to try basketball at the time. I just gave it a shot one year – liked it – so I stuck to it."

Without the American summer camps to rely upon, Bougaieff, 22, had to polish his hardwood skills the old fashioned way.

"I never went to any kind of summer camp," he explained. "I only played in the Quebec camp in the summer. It's like a provincial program. The big thing would be the junior nationals where all the provincial teams would meet and compete."

After high school, Bougaieff spent two years at Collège Montmorency where he was twice named All-Canadian. For his senior year, the big man led the 24-5 squad to the Quebec Provincial Championship while averaging 22 points, 13 rebounds, 3 blocks, and 3.5 assists.

Bougaieff's success both in the classroom and on the court caught the attention of Rice head coach Willis Wilson and earned him an athletic scholarship. Rice, one of the most prestigious universities in the United States, has a major athletic program that demands a balance between the classroom and the playing fields for all student-athletes.

"I thought it was the best combination of athletics and academics I could find in the United States at the time," recalled Bougaieff. "Rice has a great academic tradition. Playing college basketball in the NCAA was always a goal."

Bougaieff has improved tremendously at Rice. He has increased his point and rebound averages in each season, from 2.2 and 2.7 for his freshman season, to 5.0 and 5.9 for his sophomore season, and last year to 8.3 and 7.6. He entered his freshman year weighing only 210 pounds, backing up All-WAC centre Shawn Igo. He has bulked up in the weight room each summer, pushing his weight to over 240 pounds.

"I think with the added strength comes added confidence," said Bougaieff. "You feel better when you're a little bigger, a little stronger."

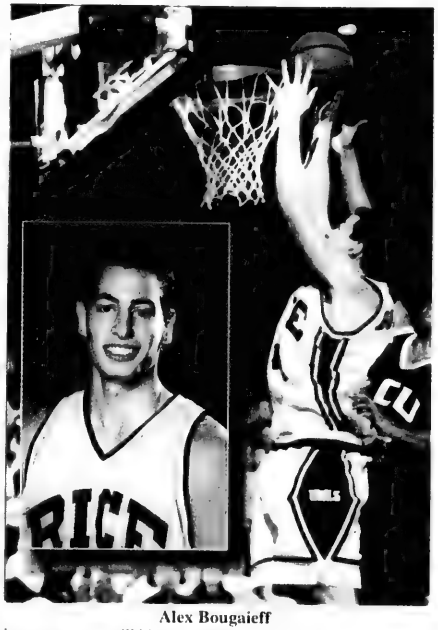
A strong rebounder for the Rice Owls, Bougaieff became a shot-blocking presence last year with 36 rejections in 27 games, including five in one game against SMU. His career game high for rebounds is 18, set last season against TCU, while he scored a career-best 19 against Texas Pan-American. Bougaieff has also extended his mid-range jumper from 12-14 feet in his freshman year to 17 feet, and looks to add a consistent, back-to-the-basket repertoire in his final season. He is a starter this season, after being part-time in that area for his sophomore and junior seasons.

Earlier this year, Bougaieff missed some games with a bad knee, but returned in early January with a 21-point, eight-rebound game against Texas Pan-American. He is currently averaging 31.1 minutes, 12.2 points, and 7.9 rebounds per game. His .474 shooting percentage from the field (82 out of 173) is tops on the team.

Last summer, Bougaieff played for Canada at the World University Games in Spain. Though Canada was eliminated 87-82 in the quarter-finals by a talented American squad, Bougaieff led his country with 22 points, eight rebounds, and two blocks. He did this against Chris Mihm (Texas) and Brendan Haywood (North Carolina), both 7-footers expected to be NBA lottery picks.

Before Bougaieff leaves Rice, he would like to play in the NCAA Tournament, something that has evaded the Owls the past several seasons.

"Yes, definitely it's one of my goals to make it to the post-season before my college career is over," he said. "I have one more season and I'd like to do it. When I came to Rice, I just wanted to play college basketball, but once you get here you realize the next step is having a winning season, going far in the conference tournament, in the post-season."



Alex Bougaieff

Last season, Rice finished with an 18-10 record (8-6 in the WAC), a 12-game turnaround from the 1997-98 campaign. The improvement was third best in Division I last year. However, over the summer, eight schools left the 16-team WAC to form their own conference, cutting the conference in half.

This left the WAC without an automatic bid to the 2000 NCAA Tournament, so if Rice makes the Big Dance for the 1999-2000 campaign, it will have to earn it with an at-large bid. With a weakened league and a strong returning nucleus that includes Bougaieff, 5-foot-11 point Mike Wilks and 6-foot-6 forward Erik Cooper, Rice has high expectations. The Owls also gain 6-foot-11 Providence College transfer T.J. McKenzie to bolster the front court. With 20 plus wins this season, an NCAA bid or at least an NIT berth is certainly within reach.

Bougaieff, a WAC scholar-athlete who will graduate this June with a dual major in math and economics, has had the opportunity to also combine culture with basketball. During the summer of 1997, he led Canada to the gold medal at the Maccabiah Games in Israel. The competition gave Bougaieff the chance to visit Israel and meet Jewish athletes from many sports.

"I think it's a great opportunity, a great event," he said. "Unfortunately there was the opening ceremony incident [the collapsed bridge tragedy that killed four Australian athletes]. But still it's a great experience."

It actually was sheer luck that Bougaieff got to participate in the Maccabiah. He had never heard of the Games before leaving for college.

"The Maccabi team coach was from Montreal," explained Bougaieff. "He coached at Concordia University. That's how I found out about it. He knew I was Jewish and he called me the spring before and told me they were putting a team together."

In every Maccabiah going back to the first-ever basketball competition, the United States and Israel made it to the finals. In 1997, that changed. Canada knocked off Israel in the semi-finals while the United States was upset by Britain.

After losing to Israel in a preliminary game, Canada took down the Israelis in overtime in the semis with use of a strong finish by Bougaieff against current Cal-Berkeley centre Shahar Gordon. The championship game against Great Britain was no contest, as Bougaieff's 28-points (mostly mid-range jumpers) led all scorers in a 76-60 win. Bougaieff was named tournament MVP.

"It was pretty amazing," he said. "But once we got to the finals, we knew we could beat Great Britain… It was a matter of going out and doing it."

Will we be hearing of Bougaieff's exploits in the Israeli League after the talented big man graduates from Rice?

"Possibly. I had great time while I was there," he said. "Right now I don't know. I still have this season left at Rice."

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

The Vow

On the eve of the Six Day War, in the Negev along the Egyptian-Israeli border, a young soldier found himself sharing a tent with an older man. When they retired for the evening, the older man removed two laundered and ironed sheets from his rucksack and carefully spread them out on the ground, smoothing out any creases that might have set into the fabric.

The young soldier was amazed. "Here we are, in the middle of the desert, covered in dust, deprived of sleep; we haven't washed ourselves properly in days – and he insists on smoothing out his sheets!" the young soldier thought to himself.

Noticing his incomprehension, the man explained: "I am a Holocaust survivor. During the Holocaust, I was forced to work in the ghetto washing sheets for German soldiers. We had no sheets in the ghetto, but every day we washed sheets for the Nazis. During those years, I vowed to myself if I ever survived, I would always sleep on clean sheets.

"The Nazis were trying to make us believe that we were inhuman, worthless, but the lesson I learned was that one must respect oneself, cherish oneself, for every human being is a treasure."

Then the older man said good night, turned over on his side, and went to sleep on the spotless sheets laid out beneath him under the Negev sky somewhere along the Egyptian-Israeli border.

The Legacy

The following tale was told by a young girl at a storytelling evening in Toronto during Holocaust Education Week:

"My grandmother came from the town of Apt in Poland. She was a young, newly married woman when the Nazis occupied Poland. Her husband was soon deported to a labour camp. Over the protests of her family, she went in search of him.

"She returned to Apt the next day, only to find that the Nazis had unleashed a savage attack on the town almost immediately after her departure. Her entire family was murdered, gone forever. She would never see them again, and was not even able to say one last goodbye to her mother."

The girl concluded her story with the following lesson:

"Ever since then, my grandmother had a rule. You were never allowed to leave her angry or in a fight with another family member. My grandmother insisted that we make up and forgive one another. She also insisted that our last words before leaving, no matter what had transpired before, had to be 'I love you.' Because you never know when that opportunity will be taken away from you, forever."

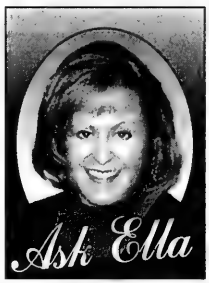
About Life



Dear Ella,

I took my car in for service last week to fix my brakes. When I picked it up, I realized the brakes were squealing. I went back today to get them fixed and my car was returned to me filthy.

When I got home and picked up my mail, there was an envelope clearly marked "do not bend" in red marker. It had a picture in it that is special to me. The envelope was folded in half to fit in the mail box.

Finally, we took the family out to dinner. There are four of us. We waited 45 minutes for our food and had to send two of the meals back. One was wrong and one was cold.

What is going on? The service industry seems to be getting worse and worse. Do you hear about these stories too or am I just going to the wrong places?

Service Next to None

Dear Service Next to None,

You are not alone in your frustration. Unfortunately there are many people in the service industry who do not work up to expectation. Sometimes it is due to lack of caring, lack of pride, unhappiness, cutbacks, pressure, poor working conditions, inadequate training, a bad day or a simple human error.

However, let's not forget that for every bad service we encounter, we have probably had many good ones that often go without notice: the garbage pick up, the person at the bakery, the recycling person, the people who take care of your banking, your doctor, the list is endless.

You can't change everyone, but you can change your reaction and the places you choose to patronize.

Move on if you can't get the service you need. Speak to a manager for help. Don't argue, fight and get your blood pressure up. It will usually get you nowhere. In the worst case scenario don't accept inadequate service and never return to that establishment again.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Israel will exit Lebanon by July

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak won unanimous cabinet backing last Sunday for his oft-repeated promise to end Israel's long military presence in Lebanon by this summer.

The decision, read by cabinet secretary Isaac Herzog, reaffirms the government's goal of reaching an agreement with Syria that would facilitate a withdrawal, but emphasizes that Israel is determined to bring its troops back to the international border by July, even without Syria's blessing.

Barak vowed to the ministers that the Israel Defence Forces would be deployed along the international border with Lebanon by mid-year. He added: "I don't advise anyone to test our reaction once we're deployed there."

The cabinet decision also stressed Israel's commitment to bolster the settlements along the Lebanese border and promised not to abandon Israel's longtime allies in the security zone, the members of the South Lebanon Army.

Justice Minister Yossi Beilin, one of the first leaders to call for a plan to withdraw from Lebanon, called on his fellow ministers to support the prime minister's policy and to make a concentrated effort to advance the peace process during this window of opportunity.

PREEMPTIVE STRIKE: Following an intelligence tip-off by the GSS (General Security Services), a combined force of security personnel, border police and army units prevented a deadly terrorist attack when they laid siege to a house in the Israeli-Arab town of Taibe last week, just north-east of Tel-Aviv. Four terrorists were killed and one captured in the operation. Hamas said the Palestinian Authority had assisted Israel in uncovering the cell. [ISRANET photo]

Charities praise budget

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) views the recent federal budget as a mixed bag, but charities are singing its praises.

Congress says it would have liked to see more spending on health, child care and social housing.

But United/Combined Jewish Appeal campaigns and other charities across the country are pleased that the budget has again made it easier to donate publicly traded stocks, bonds and other securities.

Finance Minister Paul Martin's Feb. 28 budget reduced the amount of capital gains on which a donor is taxed on contributions of securities to charities, from 37.5 percent, to 33 percent.

Martin did the same thing three years ago, but the reduction then was far more dramatic: the taxable portion of capital gains from the donation of securities to charities was halved, from 75 percent to 37.5 percent.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto says that following the 1997 budget, donations of stocks increased from both new and existing donors.

The latest move is expected to stimulate gifts of securities even more, especially in a period that has seen unprecedented growth in the stock market.

"With more people accumulating wealth through stocks and securities, we must be in the position to capitalize today on this historically booming market to meet the needs of future generations," Ted Sokolsky, vice-president of fund-raising at Toronto's UJA Federation, said in a statement.

"I was quite impressed by this move," said Robert Kleinman, director of financial resource development for FEDERATION CJA in Montreal. Martin "looked at the whole environment and said, 'Let's entice people to give [securities] and make it easier.' It's not only a question of technique, but of timing. Many Canadians have been doing well because of stock options they've been issued."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Census Questions

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC), are urging the federal government to retain two questions in the 2001 census. The groups want to keep queries on respondents' religion and ethnic origin. In a letter to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, cabinet members and senators, CJC president Moshe Ronen and UIAFC president David Goldstein said omitting the questions would constitute "a serious error." The Jewish leaders said the questions provide communal planners and fund-raisers with important data on a wide range of social, educational and demographic matters. The 1991 census asked Canadians their religion as well as ethnic origin, while the 1996 mini-census inquired about ethnicity only. Jewish communal officials rely on a blend of both tallies.

Guilty Plea

WINNIPEG — An 18-year-old woman has pleaded guilty in connection with last summer's desecration of over 200 tombstones at a Jewish cemetery here. Shawna Jennifer Lehr pleaded guilty to a charge of mischief over $5,000 in relation to the vandalism in August at the Hebrew Sick Benefit Association Cemetery. Three men charged in the same attack will appear in court in May. A 14-year-old youth also charged in the incident was scheduled to appear in court this week.

ISRAEL

Envoy Won't Return

JERUSALEM — Israel said it would not return its ambassador to Vienna following Joerg Haider's resignation as leader of Austria's far-right Freedom Party. Asked if the ambassador would return, Foreign Minister David Levy told reporters, "Unequivocally, no." Israel several weeks ago recalled its ambassador from Vienna to protest the Freedom Party's inclusion in Austria's government.

Greek Leader Visits

JERUSALEM — The president of Greece plans to visit Israel in May. Kostis Stephanopoulos' trip will mark the first time a Greek head of state visits the Jewish state, and reflects recently improved bilateral relations.

Aid to Mozambique

JERUSALEM — Israel is sending aid to flood victims in Mozambique. The blankets, medicines, tents and food are expected to arrive this week.

WORLD

France and Shoah

PARIS — French legislators have passed a law calling for a national day of tribute to citizens who helped Jews escape arrest during the Nazi occupation. Some 1,900 French citizens have been recognized as Righteous Among Nations by Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. They will be honoured on the nation's already designated day of Holocaust remembrance, held annually on July 16.

As well, French complicity in the Holocaust will become part of that country's secondary school curriculum this fall. The new teaching program will deal with the wartime deportations from the Drancy concentration camp near Paris, as well as the detention of thousands of Jews at the city's former bicycle stadium in 1942 before they were transported to Auschwitz.

Bombing Trials

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina plans to try 20 people for the 1994 bombing of the Jewish community centre here. Prosecutors are seeking life sentences for six of the defendants, including a convicted car thief and five former policemen. Investigators said they are continuing to search for all those who were involved in the attack, which killed 86 people and wounded some 300 others.

Israeli Freed

MOSCOW — An Israeli citizen held hostage by Chechen gangs since April 1998 was freed last week by Russian troops fighting insurgents in the Chechen mountains. Oleg Yemelyantsev, 43, weak and suffering from temporary paralysis, is expected to return to Israel in the coming days.

Jews Express Shock

NEW YORK — A group of Jewish activists expressed "deep shock and outrage" after four New York police officers were acquitted of all charges connected to the shooting last year of Amadou Diallo, a West African immigrant. The group, Jews for Racial and Economic Justice, said it is "appalled at the miscarriage of justice in this historic trial."

Yahoo!'s Pledge

NEW YORK — The Internet portal Yahoo! has pledged to remove racist and anti-Semitic groups that it is hosting online. The Anti-Defamation League recently called on Yahoo! to remove these organizations, saying that by hosting them, the portal is violating its own rules.

London Holocaust Trial Nears End

LONDON — Holocaust revisionist David Irving mocked victims of the Holocaust by "feeding and encouraging the most cynical anti-Semitism" in his speeches, it was alleged last week at a trial for a defamation suit that Irving has filed against a U.S. scholar.

The allegation was made by the lawyer for Jewish historian Deborah Lipstadt.

Irving, who denies that Auschwitz was a death camp or that there was systematic, mass destruction of Jews, claims that Lipstadt libeled him in her 1994 book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, when she called him a Holocaust denier who manipulates facts to suit his ideological bias.

In an acrimonious exchange during the closing cross-examination Lipstadt's lawyer, Richard Rampton, told Irving that he "is feeding the anti-Semitism in your audience by mocking the survivors and dead of the Holocaust."

Irving replied that he was "mocking the liars" who, he said, had misrepresented their experiences.

After further testimony, the hearing was adjourned until March 13 for closing arguments.

New consul general optimistic about peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Meir Romem began his career with Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs over 30 years ago, Israeli diplomats dealt in large part with the Israeli-Arab conflict.

Today however, said the new consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, "we mainly emphasize the tremendous progress – economic, social and cultural – of Israel, because economically, [with regard to] high tech, Israel is a world power. There's no other country that has so many scientists and engineers as a percentage of the population."

Although Romem admitted that Israel faces "enormous" difficulties in its negotiations with the Palestinians and neighbouring Arab countries, he is optimistic about peace.

"It will take time… There is still a lot of animosity which is expressed by some of the Arab media and leaders… These are things we have to overcome. We have to work for peace, because the alternative is worse."

Meir Romem

Romem, who was born in Tel Aviv in 1941, took on his new role in Toronto at the beginning of December, following Jehudi Kinar's tenure.

His office is graced with family and career photos along with mementoes of previous postings, including Houston, Tex., where he was consul general of Israel to the Southwest (U.S.) from 1992 to 1995.

Romem is married to Rosalind, a physician who made aliyah from Cape Town 34 years ago, and is the father of four adult children and two grandchildren.

In the years since he joined Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 1965, he has also served as consul in Atlanta, Ga. (1974-79) and as deputy chief of mission at Israel's embassy in Stockholm (1982-85). Most recently he was based in Israel as director of the division of consulates in the United States.

Among his early positions was a stint as political assistant to foreign minister Abba Eban (1970 to 1974).

Romem has two master's degrees (one in political science from Haifa University, the other in Middle Eastern studies from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem) and an undergraduate degree in political science and Islamic studies.

His goals here include further strengthening what he described as strong economic, political and cultural ties between Israel and Canada. He sees his work as a long-term investment.

One area of concern he would like to address is a negative slant regarding Israel that he's seen on occasion in the press.

In Toronto, Romem's purview extends west to British Columbia, 77 percent of Canada's territory, he pointed out. (His counterpart in Montreal, Shlomo Avital, covers the rest of the country.)

Thus far Romem is impressed by the local Jewish community's devotion to Jewish values, dedication to Jewish education and curiosity about and love for Israel, he said.

Romem originally entered the diplomatic service because "one of the most important values, when I was young, was to serve our country in the best way we could. I felt I could contribute this way."

In fact, he never really considered an alternate career.

The stories' fuller dimension

From the editor's desk

These words were written in Jerusalem. From Feb. 25 to March 2, I attended the Eighth International Conference of the Jewish Media. The conference is a biennial gathering of members of the Jewish media from around the world. It was the third such conference at which I had the privilege to represent The CJN. Some readers may recall my observations from prior conferences in this column.

The idea for the conference originated with the late Uzi Narkiss when he served as the chair of the Information Department of the World Zionist Organization (WZO). It was his hope to bring journalists of the Jewish media to Jerusalem from around the world, to see firsthand and to discuss with the very newsmakers themselves, the fuller dimension of the stories in the news from Israel.

Last week's conference was attended by some 130 journalists, 120 of whom were from outside Israel. The largest contingent, not surprisingly, was from the United States. The next largest group, 13, came from Russia. There were also participants from Belarus, Georgia, Latvia, Ukraine, Uzbekistan, and for the first time, from Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan and Moldova.

Indeed, one of the chief rewards of the conference for me was meeting so disparate, yet so inter-connected, a group of professional colleagues, each of us in our own ways and in our own communities engaged in, more-or-less, the same activity.

The conference was a multi-partied, joint planning effort involving a number of sponsors: the WZO, the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), Keren Kayemeth LeIsrael, the Jewish National Fund, Keren Hayesod, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Government Press Office, the Jerusalem Post and Bank Hapoalim.

The program filled the days. It focused on four broad themes: Israeli society, the peace process, the Golan Heights dilemma and Israel-Diaspora relations. Within each theme, there were different panel discussions; all sides of the "issues" were presented.

Interspersed among the broadly themed discussions were presentations by Prime Minister Ehud Barak, Likud party leader Ariel Sharon, Minister for Israeli Society and the World Jewish Community Rabbi Michael Melchior, former prime minister Shimon Peres, and chairman of the JAFI and the WZO, Sallai Meridor.

The substantive backdrop for the conference and for the preceding seven conferences, is the fact that Israel is frequently the subject of headlines all around the world; indeed one can legitimately say, with a frequency out of all proportion to its demographic or geographic size

Given the obstinacy of this phenomenon, it was worth the effort, according to the late Uzi Narkiss, to show the Jewish media at least, the "issues" up close.

The physical background for the conference, of course, was the city of Jerusalem. It is exciting in a way that is uncommon in our Canadian context. One travels about its historic hills and through the loud colourful chaos of its commercial downtown with an ever-present feeling charging the air like an electrical current with a pulse that beats: important things are happening here. And Jerusalem is beautiful in a way that is indescribable and also uncommon in our Canadian context.

As the issues of the peace process with the Palestinians are winnowed down to the difficult last one, namely the status of Jerusalem, the weight of "unfriendly" international opinion heaped on Israel will grow increasingly burdensome.

Indeed, as these words were being written. there was a great deal of apprehension among Israelis that during his visit later this month to Israel, the Pope will make a sharp political "statement" in support of Palestinian claims.

Thus, if Israel is destined to stand alone in its resolve and sovereign claim over a unified, undivided, capital Jerusalem, it is important that the Jews of the world stand alongside. Uzi Narkiss understood this even in 1985.

Over the course of the next few weeks, I shall reproduce some of my notes from the conference.

German community angry at Oberlander report

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Helmut Oberlander, the Kitchener, Ont., builder who served as a wartime interpreter for a Nazi killing unit, is one step closer to deportation thanks to a Federal Court decision last week.

In a 91-page report, Judge Andrew MacKay ruled that Oberlander, 76, entered Canada and obtained citizenship by misrepresenting his wartime activities when he was questioned by RCMP officers in Europe. Oberlander would not have been admitted to Canada had he been truthful when he was interviewed in Germany in 1953, MacKay stated.

Served in Nazi killing unit

"I find that if Mr. Oberlander had answered questions truthfully, including his experience as an interpreter with [Einsatzkommando] 10a for the SD, an organization determined in 1946 to be criminal, his application would have been rejected, either because he would have been perceived as a member of the SD, even if he were not, or because he would have been perceived as a collaborator," MacKay wrote.

MacKay found that Oberlander's lack of candour continued in the Kitchener courtroom, that significant portions of his testimony were not believable and that "his recollections, as revealed in his testimony, are selective."

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) welcomed the judge's report and called for Oberlander's speedy removal. However, the German-Canadian Congress (GCC), which includes 90 Canadian organizations under its umbrella, said it was disappointed in the judge's findings.

"We want to talk to members of the cabinet," said Ernst Friedel, executive director of the GCC. "We are not here to defend war criminals but to ensure that justice is done." He said there was no evidence that Oberlander personally committed any war crimes.

Eric Hafemann, Oberlander's lawyer, said Oberlander was never paid for serving with Ek 10a and so, "in fact, he was a slave."

He said he too wished to address the cabinet to point out "where the judge was wrong…There was one guy sitting there [the judge], making totally erroneous findings, and we have no recourse? That's ridiculous."

Friedel said the GCC has fielded "a lot of phone calls and people are upset." Hafemann was quoted in the Kitchener-Waterloo Record saying that "people are furious" and "this place will explode" if Ottawa attempts to deport Oberlander.

CJC reacted quickly to Hafemann's quoted remarks, saying it was greatly concerned with the "reckless and incendiary public reaction of some in the K-W area to the Oberlander decision."

"This type of provocative language will serve only to incite," said Ellen Cole, chair of CJC's community relations committee. "It is irresponsible, it is dangerous and Mr. Hafemann, as an officer of the court, should know better. We are extremely disappointed."

Keith Landy, CJC's Ontario region chair, contacted Waterloo Regional Police chief, Larry Gravill, and asked him "to take any action which he deems appropriate."

Explaining his remarks, Hafemann said the community's anger is directed towards Ottawa. "I haven't heard one hint that anybody is thinking that members of the local Jewish community would be a target."

Friedel said the GCC wishes to maintain good relations with the Jewish community. The GCC is "not defending anyone who committed any crimes…If we don't jump to the defence of someone who is unfairly accused, who else will do it?"

Under Canadian immigration law, the court found as a question of fact that Oberlander lied to get into Canada. It is now up to the cabinet, acting on a recommendation from Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan, to strip Oberlander of his citizenship. At that point, he would become subject to a deportation order. There is no appeal from the court's finding of fact.

Surveying the evidence before him, MacKay found that there was no evidence that Oberlander participated in atrocities or that he was a member of the SD, the security arm of the SS. However, he found that as a young Volksdeutsch [ethnic German] living in Ukraine, he was assigned as an interpreter to Einsatzkommando 10a of Einsatzgruppe D, a mobile killing unit that followed German army forces in the southern Soviet Union. The Einsatzgruppen were responsible for the murder of more than two million civilians, mostly Jews and communists, MacKay stated.

Oberlander's claim that he did not even know until 1970 the name of the unit in which he served for 1½ years "is not worthy of belief," MacKay stated.

The judge also questioned Oberlander's statement that he did not know about a standing order that every member of a Kommando had to participate in an execution, though "he acknowledged that older men of the unit were required to participate in the executions carried out by Ek 10a."

The judge also expressed doubt about Oberlander's claim that he did not participate in interrogations. During anti-partisan activities, Oberlander was armed with a machine pistol, and "the interpreter's role then was to question persons detained, and those without valid explanation for their presence or their activities were in trouble."

HRDC funding aids Jewish Vocational Services

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto (JVS) recently described how its programs funded by Human Resources Development Canada (HRDC) have helped the unemployed.

In a press release sent to the Toronto media, JVS speaks of Kveta Stewart, 38, who was running out of employment insurance and had recently separated from her husband when she began a JVS employment preparation and job search assistance program called Women in New Roles, which is funded by HRDC.

As part of the program, she had to make a presentation in front of her class and instructor.

"Feedback was very helpful and constructive. It gave you the courage and strength to believe in yourself and go out and find that job," she said.

HRDC has been repeatedly criticized since an audit report conducted by the internal audit branch of the HRDC and released to the media in January, found inadequate record keeping and lax monitoring of job creation programs.

"There has been so much negative publicity," said Carol Sevitt, communications consultant for JVS in Toronto. "People are really forgetting that HRDC funds important programs that could not be run without their support."

In the past fiscal year – which runs from April 1 to March 31 – JVS of Greater Toronto received just over $3 million in HRDC grants for 10 different programs including Youthinc, a career centre for young people, and Women in New Roles.

JVS of Greater Toronto is a beneficiary agency of the United Way and UJA Federation and receives funding for specific programs from government ministries and departments.

The media reported that many of the HRDC's files reviewed by auditors were scant and lacked information, such as the rationale for accepting a project.

But Kim Coulter, director of career services at JVS in Toronto, says that in the 10 years she has been working for JVS, HRDC always required a proposal or budget for contracts she worked on.

HRDC properly monitors JVS's programs, she said, pointing out that JVS has to submit monthly financial and activity reports that include statistics such as how many people participated in a program and how many people were hired, she said.

Also, HRDC usually conducts a six-month review of JVS programs and JVS has to submit a financial statement at the end of each contract, detailing whether its program has stayed within projected costs, Coulter said.

"We feel that we have been monitored very well by them. They ask the detailed questions and we give the detailed answers," she said.

He says the government's monitoring of a six-month internship for young people funded by HRDC has been "ongoing and close" since the program began in the fall of 1999.

"Our experience is that they are being very diligent," he said.

By distributing the press release, Coulter said, "we were trying to say [that] JVS is able to provide a good service to the community based on the funding we receive from HRDC. If it weren't for the HRDC, there would be a lot of people not realizing their career goals."

Yiddish has a word for it

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lively street language is so common among Jews, especially those fluent in Yiddish, that it can be considered a national literature, says Toronto Yiddish author, translator and lecturer Shirley Kumove.

Yiddish has such respect for the spoken word that one of its famous sayings is that a good expression is a good introduction, said Kumove, who was recently the guest speaker at a Friends of Yiddish Chai Tea, at Holy Blossom Temple.

The author of Words Like Arrows and More Words, More Arrows said the secret of a good Yiddish expression, especially those in curses, is that it is pithy and witty. "What is desirable in Yiddish is that it be short and sweet."

Most Yiddish expressions are remembered for their caustic wit, and this is particularly evident in the sallies between Jews who come from different countries, Kumove said.

What gives a Yiddish speaker particular pleasure, she said, is to use a Yiddish expression that the speaker knows the hearer will not understand.

The same Yiddish word may have different meanings, which makes some expressions difficult to translate into English.

Examples of expressions she offered were: The definition of a "Yiddish summer" is seven weeks, with four weeks being devoted to getting ready for Rosh Hashanah.

After the High Holy Days, another expression sums up what the housewife faces: "dirty linens and leftovers."

On the eve of Yom Kippur, even thieves become pious, only to return to their questionable ways after the Day of Atonement.

Where politics are played hard

An encounter with the tensions and the emotions of Mideast politics can be as treacherous and as painful as scraping one's hand across the sharp cutting edges of coral that lie hidden just beneath the surface of the water. Three incidents last week were illustrative.

While in the company of Palestinian Authority's (PA) president Yasser Arafat, French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin was injured by stone-throwing Palestinians at Bir Zeit University. Earlier in the week, Jospin had deigned to refer to Hezbollah operating in south Lebanon as terrorists. When Jospin returned home, President Jacques Chirac reprimanded him, thereby adding insult to the French prime minister's injury.

Later in the week, the entire foreign consular corps that maintains relations with the PA was convened at Orient House in east Jerusalem by Faisal al-Husseini, the PA appointee for Jerusalem affairs. Determined to dictate their protocol, Husseini would "lay down the law" for these diplomats once and for all.

Henceforth, Husseini proclaimed to the obviously uncomfortable foreigners gathered around the table like schoolchildren in detention, they would be permitted to meet with their Israeli counterparts in (west) Jerusalem only if they met with Palestinian officials in east Jerusalem. Meeting Palestinian officials in Gaza or in Ramallah, Husseini ordained, would thus require the diplomats to meet Israeli officials in Tel Aviv.

Finally, there was the spectacle in the Knesset last week of certain members of the government's own coalition joining with the Opposition to embarrass Prime Minister Ehud Barak by supporting a Likud bill aimed at controlling the referendum ratification process in the event of a peace treaty with Syria.

The prospect of returning all or most or even some of the Golan Heights to Hafez al-Assad as part of a peace treaty with Syria has left Israelis staring into a deep, heart-rending, existential chasm. On both sides of the issue, there is great and tearful unease. But the forces opposed to withdrawal have taken an unprecedented parliamentary step to ensure that a peace proposal will not be ratified.

Likud Knesset member Silvan Shalom introduced a bill that requires a Golan referendum based upon a majority of all the people who were merely eligible to vote. (Our emphasis) Usual democratic practice defines the winning side of a vote on the basis of the majority of the people who actually turn out to vote.

The bill passed first reading.

Politics in this region are played hard.

But it would be too high a toll if the democratic process itself were impugned as a result.

Oldest Sephardi shul in Europe?

On the night of Aug. 30, 1944, a few German E-boats nipped into Ancona harbour and torpedoed three hospital ships. Several aircraft from my Wimpy squadron were sent to a nearby airfield for night patrol security, with Spitfire and Beaufighter patrols during the day.

We never did find those E-boats, I suspect because Dubrovnik and nearby Lake Kotor and the many islands along that coast provided safe sanctuary for the objects of our hunt, that area being part of Croat (or Ustasha or German-friendly) territory.

I was, however, shown the shul in Ancona on my one day off, by a Jewish fellow originally from Trieste, who was then an interpreter with the British Army.

UN ruling is legally binding

Regrettably, The CJN story on the government's refusal to comply with the UN school funding ruling ("Canada's response to UN blasted as shameful," CJN, Feb. 10), uncritically repeats the popular distortion that the ruling is "not legally binding."

The Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and its Optional Protocol, (allowing citizen complaints about rights violations) were ratified in 1976 after the federal government specifically obtained the consent of Ontario and the other provinces to adhere to all the terms of the treaty and abide by the views of the human rights committee under the Optional Protocol when and if they should find that a law or policy of the province violated the covenant. The covenant and the optional protocol to the covenant are both legally binding instruments as a direct consequence of Canada's voluntary ratification. The covenant, as well as the complaints protocol, are fully binding international laws.

Explicit religious discrimination in education funding was found to violate the treaty. Canada and Ontario now have an obligation under international law to eliminate the discrimination. If explicit religious discrimination by the Ontario government in open violation of international law is allowed to continue, no one in Canada can consider themselves safe, and Canada's leadership role in human rights will be effectively scrapped.

Ashamed of discrimination

The United Nations Human Rights Commission has cited Canada for violation of its civil rights covenant, a covenant to which Canada was a signatory in 1976. The ruling concerns Ontario's education funding policy which the United Nations considers discriminatory.

Ontario funds public schools and separate schools, while denominational schools do not receive funds. The Supreme Court has ruled that there is nothing preventing Ontario from doing this. In fact, the government extended funding to separate schools for grades 10 to 13 about 20 years ago; constitutionally they were funded only to Grade 10. There were no other groups to qualify when the constitution was written. The government can obviously make the decision to fund. Less affluent provinces in Canada do so.

The cost of funding these schools would be less than two percent of the education budget. The actions of Ontario reflect on the integrity of Canada, and I am ashamed of its state sponsored discrimination.

Real cost of education

There are more than 40,000 students at private religious schools in Ontario. The Ontario government has said it would be too costly to support these students in their current location even by just allowing these taxpayers to reduce their public school support payment while their children are attending the private schools.

Why don't we all register our children in the public school system this September so that the Ontario government can see what the real cost would be to school our children in their facilities? I'm sure building new schools and employing more staff would be much more expensive, notwithstanding that they could never build enough space for all of them by September.

It is our children's right to attend public school whether there is space for them-or not. Let's enrol 40,000 more kids in the system and see what happens!

A fiercely proud Jew

Doña Gracia Nasi controlled Jewish life in the Ottoman Empire and beyond

By SARAH TAIEB-CARLEN

Imagine a Jewish woman who, in the year 2000, was New York's wealthiest and most powerful person, to the point of being able to organize the boycott of La Guardia Airport, or challenge the Pope, or monopolize the software and hardware industry.

Doña Gracia Nasi was just such a woman! Born Beatrice de Luna in Lisbon around 1510, she married Francisco Mendes in 1528, who was head of the Mendes "banking house," and like her, a Marrano. When he died eight years later, he left her a huge fortune.

Lisbon was not safe for Marranos in 1536, and although Jews were not allowed in England at the time, Doña Gracia went to London with her young daughter, her sister and her two nephews. Shortly thereafter, she left for Antwerp, which was then the commercial and financial centre of northern Europe. There, the spice trade, one of the family's specialties, proved to be an enormous source of profit.

Her brother-in-law, Diogo Mendes, was known as the Spice King of Europe. He married Doña Gracia's sister, Brianda, and the fabulous wealth and influential social position of the House of Mendes made it easier for them to live as secret Jews in Antwerp.

Aware of the risks they were taking, Diogo and Beatrice organized an underground network which allowed Spanish and Portuguese Jews to leave their countries and find safe havens elsewhere.

The Inquisition initiated a posthumous trial against Diogo, accusing him of heresy. Beatrice fought courageously to prove that he had been a good Christian, but she eventually had to give the emperor 100,000 ducats to have the accusations dropped.

Many nobles were now courting her daughter, and Beatrice decided to go to Venice. She did not reside there too long because she was placed under arrest and the papal legate in Venice decided her daughter should be raised in a nunnery.

Again, money bought her freedom, but feeling most insecure, she left Venice for Ferrara, in Italy where she and her family openly reverted to Judaism. She became known as Doña Gracia Nasi, no longer a secret Jewess, but a fiercely proud one.

She was so generous and daring that the Portuguese poet-chronicler Samuel Usque wrote: "Who has seen revived the intrinsic piety of Myriam, offering her life to save her brethren? The great prudence of Deborah, in governing her people? That infinite virtue and great sanctity of Esther, in helping those who are persecuted? The much praised strength of the most chaste and magnanimous widow Judith, in delivering those hemmed in by travail?

"Such has the Lord sent to you in these days from the most supreme rank of his armies, embodying them in a soul of His which by high chance and your happy lot is installed in the most womanly body of the fortunate Jewess Nasci ... In brief, the wide pinions and outspread wings of this eagle have saved a great part of your sons in their flight from the cruelty of the Portuguese, so that she thus imitated the Lord at the time of the exodus from Egypt."

But, with the founding of the Jesuit Order in 1540 and the strengthening of the Inquisition, even Ferrara was no longer safe and Doña Gracia felt compelled to leave again, this time for Turkey, in the summer of 1552. Sixteenth-century Turkey was a more civilized, more refined place than most European countries; it was, therefore, not really a sacrifice for Doña Gracia to leave western Europe for the Muslim Middle East.

The Turkish sultan, Bajzet II, welcomed all Jews, and in particular, rich and famous ones.

Those who possessed skills in areas that were missing in his country, such as commerce, trade, handicrafts, medicine and foreign languages were welcomed, as well as manufacturers, especially of firearms, gunpowder and cannons.

In 1553, Doña Gracia, her family and her staff took up residence in royal style in Galata, the exclusive residential suburb of Constantinople. On the day of her arrival, as a gesture of thanksgiving, she donated thousands of ducats to the hospitals and the poor of Constantinople. Her influence at the court was enormous, and she maintained a constant, close contact with the sultan and his family.

She managed an overseas business in spices, wool, grain, clothing and textiles that was so large, she had her own ships to carry the goods. She opened branches all over the Balkans and the Archipelago, in Ragusa (today Dubrovnik), Belgrade, Sarajevo, Naxos, in Italy, and in France, especially Lyons.

In 1554, Joseph Nasi, her nephew, joined the family in Constantinople, and from then on, the nephew and aunt worked closely together in all branches of the business.

Secure and powerful in Turkey, she now proceeded to keep a promise she had made to her husband: to have him buried in the Holy Land. Unfortunately we have no details about this extraordinary and extremely dangerous enterprise; but she did manage to have his remains exhumed from a churchyard in Lisbon and taken to the Valley of Jehoshaphat in Jerusalem.

Until her death, Doña Gracia controlled Jewish life in the Ottoman Empire and even beyond; she is the only woman to have done so in the history of the Diaspora.

Her charity knew no bounds. She continued to feed a hundred poor people at her own table at every meal, as she had started to do in Ferrara.

She took care of the needy Jews in Palestine; she redeemed Jews enslaved by the Knights of Malta; in 1554, 1556 and 1561, epidemics plagued the empire and she generously opened her purse to help Jews and non-Jews alike; she built hospices, orphanages, schools, hospitals and roads all over Turkey.

She founded a yeshiva in Constantinople, where, according to Sephardi tradition, half the time was devoted to religious study, and the other half to secular subjects, mostly mathematics, medicine, philosophy and astronomy.

In Salonika, she founded a midrash, (as it is called in Sephardi communities, as opposed to beit-midrash in Ashkenazi communities). In Tiberias, where she revived the Jewish settlement, she founded a talmudic academy and a number of synagogues.

The chronicler, Immanuel Aboab, described her "excellent virtues and noble deeds, regarding which it would be possible to write many books."

The physician Amatus Lusitanus wrote that she was "adorned by all the virtues." Rabbi Almosnino of Salonica called her "The Lady, crown of the glory of goodly women." Samuel Usque summed up all these praises and called her "the heart of her people."

Biographers and historians agree that no other woman in Jewish history has been surrounded with such well-deserved devotion.

The power and influence of Doña Gracia is nowhere more evident than in the famous boycott of Ancona, a seaport in the Adriatic coast of Italy where the Inquisition had organized a series of auto-da-fé (trials and executions). During this time, 25 Jews were found guilty of heresy and were strangled and burned in front of a jeering crowd.

This pained and infuriated Doña Gracia so much that she decided to vindicate their memories. With the consent of the Turkish sultan, she organized an international boycott of Ancona, the port from which ships and cargoes were diverted to Venice, at great risk to herself.

This showed uncanny vision for the time because she was able to go beyond the traditional response of the Jews – suffering in silence – and to prove that they could fight successfully on economic and political levels.

Unfortunately, a few weeks later, Rabbi Moses Bassola of Ancona and, then, Rabbi Joshua Soncino of Constantinople opposed the boycott on communal and religious grounds.

Doña Gracia was devastated. This terrible blow impelled her to depart for the Holy Land earlier than she had planned. She had a mini-palace built in Tiberias where she intended to create an independent Jewish settlement thanks to the privileges that the sultan of Turkey granted her in exchange for 1,000 ducats a year.

Unfortunately, she died before she realized her greatest dream: to reclaim the land of Israel for the Jews and to be buried beside her husband. We do not know where or when she died. The best guess of scholars is in the early summer of 1569.

Jews all over the world mourned the Señora. Elegies, poems, and kinot were read in synagogues where memorial services were held. Kings and queens in the Christian and Muslim worlds, Jewish communal leaders and scholars from all over the world, needy people who had shared food at her table, all grieved for her.

In the words of one historian: "Never perhaps in the whole of Jewish history, since the days of Salome Alexandra, the Hasmonean Queen of Judea who had died 16 centuries before, had a woman's death been so generally and so profoundly mourned."

Opinions

Fairness for all?

Toronto is probably one of the most ethnically diverse cities amongst the world's metropolitan areas. One would therefore have every right to conclude that in this city, people of all backgrounds are treated fairly, without distinction.

Unfortunately, in some important respects this is not so. The Commission on Systemic Racism in the Ontario criminal justice system, sponsored by the attorney general of the province, has issued a disturbing report, which claims that blacks are treated differently.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Here are some of its conclusions:

• Members of the black community are much more likely to be stopped, questioned and searched by the police than white or Chinese people.

• Black people are more likely to be denied bail or to have strict conditions applied to their pre-trial release.

• Pre-trial procedures by state officials are clearly unevenly applied to blacks.

• Blacks are over-represented in our jails.

Is the reason for this catalogue that blacks commit more crimes than anyone else does? That conclusion cannot be supported by a fair analysis, says the report.

Note the following considerations:

• Black people are more likely to be stopped and questioned by the police in Toronto than other persons.

• The police appear more likely to accept or provide negative information about black accused than about those of other racial backgrounds.

• Crown attorneys in Toronto are said to be more likely to seek the detention of black accused than those of another race.

I will never forget a personal experience I had when I served as vice-chair of the Human Rights Commission. A driver was frequently at my disposal, and I came to know him very well indeed. He was a gentleman from the east coast, the descendant of many generations of black Canadians. I was glad to have him as my friend and co-worker.

I remember how often he told me that prior to picking me up, he had been stopped by the police on the highway or on some city street. It was not because he was speeding or for any other discernable purpose – for he had never had a traffic violation brought against him. He was stopped only because he was a "sample black."

Every time I heard that tale I was enraged, and I can only guess how it affected him. Why was he singled out, we wondered. Perhaps because the car he was driving was moderately expensive and because it was in top condition? Perhaps our law enforcement people thought that this did not square with a black driver who, because of his race, was therefore suspected of being a potential thief.

While this happened some years ago, the practice has not stopped, I hope that Toronto's new police chief will give this whole issue his close attention

Whose Birthright?

Since the time of Jacob and Esau, birthrights have been a difficult matter. We all know how that story turned out, whether or not we agree on the details and the motivations of the participants. Now, with the Israel Birthright program taking young people to Israel for what looks like a free ride, once again the idea of entitlement has been the cause of some argument (to put it mildly) in our communities.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

As I understand it, there are two camps. One, taking the side of the sponsors of the program, points out that a very low percentage of young Jews from North America ever visit Israel. This first experience with a peer group, they believe, will bring these Diaspora Jews into a strong relationship with Israel's people and places, her history and her place in the Jewish heart. The defenders of the program also argue that the program is not meant to stand on its own, but to be coupled with a strong local commitment by home communities to keep the enthusiasm of participants at a high level once they return home.

The other side takes a rather different perspective. It comes down to this: Why should your kid get a free trip to Israel when I had to pay for (and here you fill in the blanks) a year at an Israeli University, a USY, NIFTY or NCSY pilgrimage, a Biluim summer, a semester on a kibbutz? If I had to pay, so should the parents of these kids. Or, an alternative argument: Why did your kid get chosen and mine missed out?

There is something charmingly optimistic in the first argument – if you pay for it, they will come to love it – and something mean-spirited and narrow in the second. There are many issues around Israel's relations with the Diaspora, issues that gen-Xers will encounter, often with no background from which to speak. Birthright can be the start of a deeper relationship between us, here in Canada, and Israel.

There is no question that going to Israel in the company of other young Jews can be a transforming experience. Jews in university still face an amazing array of challenges to their Jewishness. While campus may no longer be the radical hotbed it was in my days, attitudes to Israel and its security are still, in many places, fairly hostile. It is easy to trash a place you have never seen, and feel superior to people you have not met. Having seen Israel first hand, no matter how briefly, can be a catalyst to finding out more about the complexity of Middle East issues. With knowledge, when the challenges come, they will not be as frightening.

But what about all of us who paid out thousands of dollars when our kids were asking for Israel experiences – or when we thought they should have them? Should we be churlish about the opportunities they missed? I don't think so for a moment. The program has not only offered a one-time experience, but it has made our communities more aware of the need for a consistent program to engage the hearts and minds of the adults coming back changed.

The best achievement of Birthright will be if it has engaged Jews whose families, for whatever reasons, did not feel the experience of Israel was worth their efforts – or who lacked the funds to give their children this opportunity. There are many such young people on this program. I know some of them, and the experience has indeed altered their lives.

Most seriously, a connection established between thousands of young North American Jews and Israelis of all conditions affects the people who will be making the next generation of decisions about Israel-Diaspora relations. We of our generation are still experimenting. Despite the disdain for non-Orthodox movements shown by Israel's rabbinate, the visceral link of our older generations cannot be destroyed.

But we need new connections to an as-yet unknown destiny. The Birthright Israel generation will take us there.

The Jewish people need to defragment

I do not like labels but, if I had to characterize my general philosophy, I would say that I am a "moderate." By this I mean that the views I hold on particular issues are not driven by ideology. My views are my attempt to balance competing interests in order to reach, what I perceive to be, a just and appropriate compromise between conflicting values.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Take capital punishment, for example. I am not ideologically opposed to capital punishment. If I was absolutely convinced that errors were never made and that the rules of due process were always scrupulously followed, I would be in favour of capital punishment for certain crimes.

However, in the country of Marshall, Milgaard, and Morin, we cannot always be sure that individuals have actually committed the crimes of which they have been convicted.

Further, I believe that, in this respect at least, I am in the mainstream of Canadian society and at the heart of the Jewish people because, essentially, Canadians are moderates, and so are Jews.

So I have, for some time now, been concerned by what I perceive to be the polarization of Canadian and North American society. On any number of social issues, the centre of the body politic is crumbling. So too in Jewish life – the Jewish people are fragmenting.

A personal anecdote: When I was president of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton, I was called upon to appear at public functions, often within the Jewish community but sometimes in the larger community as well. On these occasions, I always wore a kippah because I thought that as the representative of the Jewish community I should do so.

When I went to Israel on my last sabbatical, I decided to wear a kippah all the time. After all, what better place to wear a kippah than in the Jewish State!

The reaction of my secular friends was: "You're not religious. Why are you wearing a kippah?" The reaction of my religious friends was: "You're not religious. Why are you wearing a kippah?" Apparently, one of the few things upon which my secular and religious friends could agree was that I should not be wearing a kippah!

So I was thrilled to see an article titled, Give Judaism Back to the People, in the Feb. 14th issue of the Jerusalem Report. The author, Emuna Elon, is an apparently religious woman who is a columnist for the daily, Yediot Achronot.

What prompts Ms. Elon's article is the reaction of "Orthodox Zionist Rabbis" to recent legislation enabling women to serve in combat units of the Israel Defence Forces. These rabbis complain that allowing women to serve in these units will lead to immodesty and immorality which Orthodox soldiers will find intolerable.

Further, the rabbis say that they may have no other choice but to forbid Orthodox soldiers from serving in the IDF. Ms. Elon queries: "Are religious men the only soldiers who should be concerned about morality in the army?"

A good point. She notes that when the State was established, the nationalist rabbis did not threaten that, unless kashrut was observed in the army, Orthodox men would not perform military service. Rather, they set about the task of ensuring that all soldiers – Orthodox or otherwise – were able to keep kosher.

Elon states: "As long as only religious citizens are presumed to be interested in such basic precepts as Sabbath observance, kashrut, modesty and morality, the many Jews to whom these commandments are no less dear are being shut out.

"Judaism," she says, "belongs to everyone."

Many, if not a majority, of non-Orthodox Jews take seriously their commitment to brit milah, to Jewish education, to bar and bat mitzvah, to Jewish marriage, to Jewish burial, to shivah, and to yizkor.

I assume that no one would find the strong commitment of non-Orthodox Jews to these rituals particularly unusual. After all, through these rituals, we affirm our identification with the Jewish people. So why would it be so surprising to learn that many non-religious Jews are concerned about Shabbat and festival observance and kashrut and mitzvot and Torah study and so forth.

These, too, are elements of identification with the Jewish people. All Jews are stakeholders in Judaism and Torah. It is time to "give Judaism back to the people." Perhaps, we can do this if we emphasize the things that we have in common rather than those that fragment us.

Recently, I received an e-mail from our computer support person at work. She told me I should "defragment" my hard drive on my home computer on a regular basis. Defragment – to put separate pieces back into a unified whole.

This is what the Jewish people need – to defragment.

The Kirshner File

The world of food writer Claudia Roden

In the vanished world in which she once lived, Claudia Roden well remembers the grand and glorious food of her Sephardi family, the tantalizing fare that connects her like a gossamer thread to her idyllic childhood in Cairo.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Born into a prosperous Jewish household that prided itself on its exquisite hospitality and conviviality, Roden was raised on the fragrant scent of Middle Eastern dishes such as Istanbul pies, Aleppo cracked wheat salads and Syrian kibbeh, the pearl of Aleppan cuisine.

"We were food-oriented," said Roden, who was here recently at the invitation of Ashkenaz, the Festival of New Yiddish Culture.

By any measure, Roden, author of The Book of Jewish Food and A Book of Middle Eastern Cookery, ranks as one of the great food writers of our time. Since the appearance of A Book of Middle Eastern Cookery 33 years ago, she has won the praise of her peers and the admiration of readers appreciative of her ability to blend gastronomy with history, anthropology and ethnography.

Based in London, England, where she has lived since 1954, Roden, 63, was born in Zamalek, a leafy, well-to-do Cairo neighbourhood alive with the colour and fragrance of bougainvillaea and jasmine. There, in a sedate apartment building from whose windows she could see the mighty Nile and hear the muezzin's call, Roden and her two brothers, Ellis and Zaki, spent their formative years.

Her parents, Cesar and Nelly Douek, who passed away within months of each other in 1993, raised their children in a cosmopolitan milieu where French rather than Arabic was the language of social discourse.

Roden's forebears were of Syrian and Ottoman Turkish origin. Her great-grandfather, Haham Abraham ha Cohen Douek, was the chief rabbi of Aleppo. Her two grandfathers, Elie Douek and Isaac Sassoon, left Aleppo at the end of the 19th century when it ceased to be the hub of the camel-caravan trade and Egypt became a centre of commerce with the opening of the Suez Canal and the development of the cotton trade.

Part of a Jewish community which itself was a kaleidoscopic mosaic of nationalities, the Doueks and the Sassoons brought with them to Cairo the recipes that had sustained them for generations. Roden's mother was adept in a kitchen, but usually left the cooking to an Egyptian cook and an Italian nanny who had been instructed in the ways of Sephardi kosher cuisine.

Meals were regarded as a link with the past, a celebration of roots, a symbol of continuity, Roden explained. To this day, she can still recall the aroma of sizzling garlic cloves and crushed coriander seeds wafting from a pot on the stove.

Roden, whose father was a merchant, was sent to Paris in 1951 to continue her education. She went to France with a heavy heart, realizing that things might never be the same again. Egypt had fought a war with Israel in 1948, and the position of Egyptian Jews had eroded. "We knew we'd have to leave one day."

The 1956 Suez war sealed their fate. "There was a big fear of what would happen to the Jews. We were frightened."

It was not just paranoia. One of her relatives had been arrested, accused of being an Israeli spy. Shortly after the hostilities ended, the Doueks immigrated to Britain via Sudan.

Ensconced in London, the Doueks enjoyed the delicacies that had distinguished their table in Cairo – stuffed lamb with rice, rolled vine leaves, cheese pies, filled pastries with mashed dates, and the like.

Although she married into an Ashkenazi family and mastered the art of east European cooking, Roden was always addicted to the Sephardi recipes of her youth. There being no cookbooks for this cuisine, she assiduously collected and exchanged recipes with friends and strangers.

As a result, Roden was able to write A Book of Middle Eastern Cookery, which, after three decades, is still in print, and which she is currently revising. One of the first books on the subject, it has been translated into a myriad of languages, including Hebrew, German and Swedish. A pirated Arabic edition, for which she receives no royalties, is also on the market. Newspapers in Egypt and Saudi Arabia have published her recipes.

Claudia Roden

"Middle Eastern cuisine has become fashionable in the Anglo-Saxon world because it is taken as a model for healthy eating," explained Roden, a small, elegant woman with a café au lait complexion and jet black hair.

The mother of three grown children, she began working on The Book of Jewish Food (Penguin) – an encyclopedic masterpiece containing more than 800 recipes – 16 years ago. In search of recipes and folklore, she travelled widely, finding material in farflung places like Morocco, Israel, France, Austria and Hungary.

Is there such a thing as Jewish food? "Each region or country has its own particular Jewish dishes and these are sometimes different from the local cuisine. Jews have adopted the foods of the countries they lived in, but in every country, their cooking has had a special touch and taste."

Researching The Book of Jewish Food, which was published in a paperback version last August, gave Roden the opportunity to go back to Egypt, which she has revisited several times since. "Zamalek has changed for the worse culturally and economically. But I love the Egyptians. They are so welcoming and humorous. They feel nostalgic about the Jews who once lived in Egypt."

While working on The Book of Jewish Food, the recipient of several prizes, she finished The Good Food of Italy – Region by Region. In addition, Roden has written Mediterranean Cookery, Everything Tastes Better Outdoors and Coffee – A Connoisseurs's Companion.

Apart from her books, Roden has published pieces in London's quality broadsheet press, and her articles have appeared in Gourmet magazine. In addition, she regularly pops up at food conferences and festivals as a consultant and speaker. More than a decade ago, she hosted Claudia Roden's Mediterranean Cookery, the first BBC cooking show shot abroad.

Roden, a divorcee, cooks virtually every day when she is not travelling. And while she is partial to French, Italian and Thai food, she is always inspired by the cuisine of the Middle East when she whips up dinner for friends.

Rabbinic Reflections

What can we learn from the repetition of a phrase in the Torah?

Much of Parshat Pekudei can be found earlier in the book of Shemot. However, there is one phrase in particular that merits special attention because of the frequency with which it is repeated.

The Torah tells us of the completion of the priestly garments and the final consecration and assembly of the Tabernacle itself. After describing each garment or individual item, the Torah states that the task was carried out "as the Lord commanded Moshe."

This phrase, or an almost identical expression, is used over and over again, a total of 19 times, in the parshah. One would think that teaching that the work had been done as the Almighty commanded could have been adequately conveyed by other means. What, then, can be learned from this repetition?

One of the few commentators who discussed this issue was Don Isaac Abarbanel, who wrote his commentary on the Torah in the 15th century. He observes that in Parshat Pekudei, the descriptions of the finished work differ slightly from the instructions given several chapters earlier. In some cases, additions appear to have been made when the work was done, while in others, details that appear in the instructions are omitted during construction. Therefore, the Abarbanel explains, the repetition is justified to indicate that the work was carried out "as the Lord commanded Moshe."

Abarbanel's explanation is textual in nature. However, it is possible to suggest another explanation based on an entirely different perspective.

The chief artisan of the Tabernacle and all of its equipment was Bezalel. Clearly, he was one of the most knowledgeable of his generation, having previously been described as possessing the talent for all types of craftsmanship. The opportunity to head the team that was to build the Tabernacle, and all that was used in it, was a tremendous honour.

However, at the same time, Bezalel must almost certainly have experienced a certain sense of constraint. His mandate was only to follow the instructions given to Moshe; he was not given any opportunity to exercise his own creativity or originality in this work. Despite the fact that he was the chief artisan of his time, Bezalel was given the blueprints for what he was to create and was expected to produce a final result in accordance with those instructions. While building the Tabernacle must have been an elating experience, for someone with Bezalel's talents and creativity, it is not unreasonable to assume that there might also have been a little frustration.

From this perspective, the need for the constant repetition of the fact that everything was carried out "as the Lord commanded Moshe" becomes much clearer. Each repetition reminds us how difficult the task must have been, when Bezalel had to follow the instructions given to him to the letter. Every single item he made for the Tabernacle must have presented him with this challenge, and the Torah testifies how he rose above it on every occasion.

Each of us is similarly challenged to make proper use of our talents. We need to find a proper balance between developing our creative abilities and channelling these energies into activities that will be of benefit to those around us.

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, one of the pre-eminent rabbinic leaders of our generation, once explained that when a person is blessed by God with special gifts and has talents that distinguish the individual, these abilities should not be wasted or put to selfish use, but should be utilized in the service of God and for the betterment of society.

Please God, we should be up to the challenge.

Childhood memories

Motion Sickness*, by David Layton (Macfarlane, Walter & Ross).

Books
Bernard Baskin

Irving Layton, far removed in word and deed from the genteel Canadian tradition, often lashed out at his detractors with what he called his "cadenced vituperations."

Typical is this fulmination: "One cannot love life as much as I do, its thrust and colour and gladness, without abominating the pompous fools, the frustrated busybodies, the money-lusting acquisitive dull clods and lobotomized ideologues who make it difficult for the high-spirited to live joyously.

"It takes a good deal of humour and energy not to be sickened by all the patronizing arrogant twaddle I've had to endure in over a quarter century of poetic composition from erudite dwarfs, eunuchs, and oracular donkeys who for all their huffing and puffing can no more create a lasting poem than I can give birth to a typewriter."

For the author of Motion Sickness, growing up in the shadow of his famous and outspoken father wasn't easy. This disarming reminiscence, an account of his pre-adolescent years (10 to 14), makes plain the wild and unstructured nature of his erratic rearing.

Irving and Aviva loved their only son, but rarely allowed his needs to interfere with their tumultuous lives. Addicted to travel, they dragged David from Toronto to London, to Australia, to Marrakesh, to the Greek Islands and back to Toronto. There was for him no routinized or stable life; school was always a secondary consideration.

Motion Sickness, literally, becomes an anticipated syndrome. On a flight that was supposed to be going to Greece, he realized that something was wrong.

"I knew it wasn't possible that we could be in Athens yet – and there was something about the way everything looked, the weight of the clouds, the density of them, that didn't seem right. I knew right then and there that we were descending into India, or Karachi, or God knows where. And there was nothing I could do."

His parents constantly bickered, and the pugnacious poet would precipitously take leave of his family for months on end. Eventually, Leon Whitson, author and journalist, and Aviva's husband to be, moved in and quickly asserted his authority over the unhappy David.

One day, Whitson announced: "No more television," and crashed the television set to the floor. "There is a new law in this house," he bellowed.

Outraged, Aviva joined her son in denouncing Whitson as an insensitive and obnoxious intruder.

Whitson faltered. "For the first time he looked down at the damage he'd caused, and I could tell he was at a loss to explain himself fully. Doubt crept into his face. He'd meant to come into the house and take control, but perhaps he was no better than the rest of us. Obviously, by the look on his face, it was a horrific thought. We'll win, I thought. We'll defeat him."

Refractory David tormented his mother at every turn, cursed her with shocking four-letter words and had to be given Ritalin to keep him under control.

There is little here about Irving as a writer. And such celebrated CanLit personalities as Leonard Cohen and Scott Symons make fleeting and elusive appearances.

When David is 14, his parents decide to divorce. It is at that point that he cuts off his childhood memories that are jumbled in his mind with half forgotten schools and exotic venues and with the heightened emotions of his parents, their lovers and friends.

In a brief epilogue, the author, now 35, deplores the waning powers and judgment of his father, who at 87 sees no harm in urinating "against a wall in full

Jewish Life

World Purim traditions

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Think you know everything about Purim? Think again.

For Judaism's happiest day of the year, we are familiar with the graggers, the masquerades and the hamantaschen. But what about the holiday snowmen, the human-shaped cakes and the 90 other Purims? These are some of the Purim traditions you can visit on the Jewish Highway.

The best place to start for some global Purim traditions is at the Jewish Agency Education Department [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/festivls/purim/pugnen07.html]. In Germany on Purim eve, torches containing gunpowder would be ignited. During the Megillah reading, the gunpowder exploded with a deafening noise. In Italy, youngsters would divide into two camps and throw nuts at each other. In wintry Bukhara, a large "snow-Haman" was built near the synagogue. After the meal, a bonfire was built and everyone gathered to sing while "Haman" melted. And in Salonika, Haman-shaped cakes were baked and placed on the window ledges until the festive Purim meal. During the meal, the cakes were sliced and eaten.

The Virtual Jerusalem Purim site has also done a great job rounding up some traditions [http://www.vjholidays.com/purim/worldcus.htm]. In Cairo revellers would take to the streets in costumes riding donkeys that were dyed in stripes and patterns. Lithuania would see yeshiva students get the opportunity to dress up as rabbis, deliver outrageous speeches and gently mock their teachers. In Yemen, bridegrooms would compete at the local Jewish court for the honour of buying the oil and wax used to light the synagogue during the Megillah reading.

And what about where it all started? In Persia, a wealthy man would host a huge Purim feast in his home for the whole community. During the meal, all would march out to watch an effigy of Haman being burned, while shouting, "May the memory of Amalek be erased!" As the fire went out, the children took turns jumping over the coals, just as they did during celebrations in talmudic times.

On of the most fascinating holiday customs is creating "special Purims." According to the Jewish Agency's Jewish Education and Culture page, "Purim serves not only as remembrance of the salvation of Israel in the days of Mordechai and Esther, but is also a symbol of cases throughout Jewish history when the Jews were saved from the 'Hamans' of their generation." [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/festivls/purim/pugnen06.html]

Ninety special Purims have been created; for example, the "Winz Purim" celebrated by the community of Frankfurt-am-Main. In the 17th century, Winz Fettmilch whipped up a pogrom against the Jewish community. Miraculously, the Jews were saved from complete destruction, Winz was punished, and the Jews celebrated their deliverance from their local Haman. Their story is told in detail at the Joint Distribution Centre Web site [http://www.jdc.org.il/fsu/Russian/tradition/holidays/purim/english/frank.html].

Where can you find a gathering of a quarter million Israelis – and the only thing they're demonstrating is joy? The Adloyada is a traditional Purim carnival which has regained popularity in Israel. The name comes from the phrase "and you should drink until you don't know (ad lo yada) the difference between 'Cursed is Haman, and blessed is Mordechai.'" [http://www.vjholidays.com/purim/carnival.htm].

A couple of years ago, revellers turned downtown Tel Aviv into a giant traffic jam as they watched Mayor Ronni Milo (dressed as city's first mayor, Meir Dizengoff) lead the parade riding his reluctant white horse [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/13.Mar.1998/News/]. Behind Milo was a procession of floats with huge effigies of then prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Labour party leader Ehud Barak, Yasser Arafat and Milo himself. And further back, paraded clowns, bands, city sanitation workers and 90 pupils dressed as pitas and kebabs.

Next week, Beyond Hamantaschen: Purim foods from the four corners of the Internet.

Reflections of Israel

Jared Golberg is a student at Ryerson Polytechnic University in Toronto who recently went on a Birthright Israel trip. The following is a prose poem about the trip, written in memory of his grandmother, Aida Golberg.

Walking through the rock of silent past leaves an impression of solitude.

Coming to terms with such tranquillity is a discipline not found back home; lost in a corporate world.

I forgot how silent my thoughts were until that moment, this moment, where everything fell into place.

I looked over, wondering where my faith has gone or if it was ever there, but no matter what I was thinking, the view put everything into perspective. A view of love, anger, and of course sadness, took hold of everything within, making me shiver with relief.

Without asking, I knew someone was right behind me. I don't know if it was fake or real, but someone was there with one hand on my shoulder, experiencing fate with me. She realized I was there.

As I dug my hand into the ground, I couldn't help wondering if I was touching the exact spot where history prevailed; the exact spot where someone had had the emotion I was feeling.

My hands were dirty – But I didn't care. My pants were dusty – But I did not care.

Everything with a price meant nothing to me anymore and for the first time in a long time I did not care about money.

My world seemed to grow and surround me with such joy; a feeling lost with horns and cars – Big city fuss.

I felt nothing for a long time, but I have something now. I finally understand it all.

I made the encounter with something I never knew could exist… But it does. I saw it, I felt it, I cried for it… A state with a heart and my heart is with this state.

view of whoever happened to pass by."

In a recent interview, the author asserted that from the outset his book would be about being David Layton, not about being Irving's son.

"There might've been some really juicy bit of gossip that I could've put in, but had no relevance to what happened later on in my life – it just happened to be juicy gossip. That I kept out. But if there was juicy gossip, if there was something that was very private and intimate and I knew it would have some interest to the reader, but also had an interest to me, then it was in."

Motion Sickness is well written, lively and candid. It evokes the selfish concerns and absurd priorities of creative personalities for whom a young boy is a loving encumbrance.

JWI walk to help fight domestic violence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Julie Hershkovich, Toronto chair of Jewish Women International of Canada's Walk for Hope, displays the t-shirt, available to those who raise over $25 for the walk.

TORONTO — Jewish Women International of Canada is taking steps to end domestic violence in the country.

A "walk for hope," to be held concurrently in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg, on March 26, is intended to raise money for JWI/C's domestic violence programs, including ASTEH – alternative short-term emergency housing, and educational events and pamphlets.

The organization also puts out a resource guide for rabbis with information about domestic violence, sample sermons, and ways to look for it in their congregation.

"We need to make the community aware that domestic violence is out there. We know we cannot stop it completely, but we can make people aware it is going on. Abuse is a serious issue, and it must be addressed in the community," said Paula Mittleman, president, JWI/C.

Mittleman said that the walk began as a pilot project in Montreal last year, and was "quite successful." JWI Toronto participated in the walk-a-thon sponsored by Nissan last year, but this year, it is all ours.

Corporate sponsors for the walk, which Mittleman said should attract several hundred people, include Danier Leather, Global Furniture, Hedva Ben-David and Mackenzie Financial Corporation. Door prizes will be given after the walk, and there will be prizes for the most money raised individually and by chapter. Those who raise $25 will get a t-shirt, and tax receipts are issued for anything raised over $10.

In Toronto, registration for the walk begins 9:30 a.m. at Promenade Mall, centre court. The walk takes place from 10 a.m. to 12 noon on the lower level of the mall. Mandell Entertainment will provide music, and there will be a self-defence demonstration and refreshments. Walk chair is Juliette Hershkovich.

"It is very exciting to have women from different parts of the country walking at the same time. My dream is to have an international walk," says Mittleman.

For pledge forms and information, call JWI/C at 416-630-9313.

International Shabbat program aimed at students

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Thousands of mainly non-observant college-age youth from across North America will have the experience of Shabbat, thanks to the efforts of the National Jewish Outreach Program and its Shabbat Across America/Canada.

On March 31, over 750 synagogues and 70 campus organizations are expected to offer a traditional Friday night Shabbat service and a festive meal.

Shabbat Across America/Canada encourages host locations to tailor their program to fit the needs of their participants.

A media release from NJOP said that "by heavily targeting college students with little or no religious training and background to the beauty and significance of the Jewish Sabbath, NJOP hopes to lay a foundation of Jewish practice that will only grow stronger as SAA participants begin to have children of their own."

Canadians from Quebec to Vancouver can participate in programs. Locations include Temple Emanu-El Beth Shalom, in Montreal; Beth Shalom, in Ottawa; Temple Kol Ami, Or Hadash, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda and Solel in Toronto; Simcoe County Jewish Association in Barrie; Congregation Shaar HaShomayim in Windsor; Temple Shalom in Winnipeg; Temple Beth Tikvah in Regina; and Shaaray Tefilah in Vancouver.

Also taking part will be campus organizations and Jewish community centres in Toronto, London, and Vancouver.

The National Jewish Outreach Program was established in 1987 by Rabbi Ephraim Buchwald. Other projects include Read Hebrew America/Canada and Turn Friday Night into Shabbat. All programs are free.

Women celebrate 10th anniversary of feminist film

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ten years after the first screening of Half the Kingdom, a film about women and Judaism, the women who were in the film gathered to discuss changes they've seen in the past decade.

The film, produced by Francine Zuckerman, featured Esther Broner, Naomi Goldenberg, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Norma Joseph, Michele Landsberg and Alice Shalvi.

The panel discussion was moderated by Zuckerman, and sponsored by Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. It was the first time all the women were together in a room – "a fantasy come true," said Zuckerman.

After viewing clips of themselves, the women talked about how they've changed, how the world has changed in the past decade, and what they would like to see in the next 10 years.

In the film, Rabbi Goldstein, now director of Kolel, said her challenge was to see people take feminism seriously. The tree should bend with the winds of change, she said, not snap.

Now, said Rabbi Goldstein, she is both optimistic and pessimistic. "When I see that clip, I think about how far the tree has bent, and it has bent very far. The good news is that there have been tremendous changes in the Jewish establishment as women have become leaders. The bad news is that there are still women rabbis. We never hear anyone called a male rabbi.

"The tree is still planted in male patriarchy, and being blown at with feminine breath. We have to plant the tree in a different place, where women will nurture it, and men will help it grow."

Joseph, a professor at Concordia University, and an Orthodox Jew, said that when the film was made she felt "conflicted and divided. I wish to live as part of the community, but am often alone."

Since then, she said, she has found a "certain degree of acceptance. I love to teach about women and Judaism, and I am able to do that, and feel accepted in that world."

She is still proud and happy, she said, to be an Orthodox Jew. "If women were asked to sit at the back of a bus, they might not react negatively if they were told it was safer at the back.

"It is how we interpret things. I see the separation of men and women in synagogue, as long as it is equal, as a way to find my own independence in prayer. I spend family time in other environments. Prayer, for me, is being alone with God. A mechitzah enables that moment. I am not put to the back, but given a different experience."

Shalvi, a leading Israeli woman's rights advocate, and a founding chair of Israel Women's Network, said in the film that it was an overwhelming experience for her to have had her first aliyah, about 20 years ago. "It was the first time I had seen a Torah scroll up front and inside."

Last year, she said, her granddaughter read the Torah at her bat mitzvah, and her family saw women filled with joy as they danced with the Torah on Simchat Torah. "The younger generation is experiencing the joy that I had to wait a long time to experience."

Landsberg, a Toronto Star columnist said in the film that she did not believe in a tradition that makes women feel degraded. "Through making the film, I began to know Orthodox women, and began to understand their struggle, and realize why they have tried to change the system from within.

"As an unaffiliated Jew, however, I have become more and more disheartened about organized religion since making the film. I am an upfront Jew, but when I see the injustices in Israel, my heart is broken. I am dismayed to be associated with extreme and hateful acts being done in the name of God."

Ten years from now, she said, she would like to see us as caring, social activists. "So many Jews have noble causes, but not as Jews. I would like to see that happen. I do think [there has been] change, but I am still waiting for Jewish feminists to march together. There is still a lot to be done."

In the next decade, said Joseph, she asks that "men recognize how great women are, and women recognize how great women are. [I look forward] to a world where we can stand up and say 'look what wonderful things we can learn from feminist Jews.'"

Rabbi Goldstein wants "feminism to expand the borders," and does not want to see any stereotypical boxes. "Prayerbooks and Halachah will be egalitarian, and the underlying theme of having a women's marginal world will be over. The Jewish community will be ready for a paradigm shift. Schools and shuls will invite rabbis from different denominations and gender, and open their doors to all Jews."

For the first time since Half the Kingdom was screened 10 years ago, the film's principal participants got together for a panel discussion sponsored by Kolel: The Adult Centre for Jewish Learning. From left are Naomi Goldenberg, Alice Shalvi, Michele Landsberg, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Esther Broner, Norma Joseph and Francine Zuckerman, the film's producer.

Testament to imagination of John Wagner

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a testament to the imagination of John Wagner that he envisioned and then created a fascinating exhibition that combines the beauty of modern photography with ancient biblical wisdom.

The concept has proven so compelling, that high school students are tripping over themselves to apply his approach with their own photographs.

Beginning at 3 p.m. on March 12 and running for one month, the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) will host a photo exhibition taken from Testaments of Israel, Wagner's book that matches biblical quotations to a collection of 30 photographs of modern Israel.

Viewers will also see an exhibition of students' photos along with biblical quotations that they have selected, modelled on the approach developed by Wagner.

Wagner, the former president of Victor Hasselblad Inc., the camera company, will be on hand on opening day to provide a slide presentation about the exhibit and its genesis.

Through his book, Wagner, who lives in England, combines a love of Israel, a passion for photography and a commitment to Judaism, said Linda Majors, a publicist for the project.

Over a three-year span, he and a panel of experts sifted through 7,000 photographs taken by news and art photographers and reduced that mass to 72, which were featured in Testaments of Israel. From that number, Wagner selected the 30 that are on exhibition, Majors said.

The exhibition has travelled to major American cities and drawn rave reviews. It has proven particularly effective in motivating young people to study the Bible. They are asked to find their own photos or those from family albums and, following the example in Testaments, apply an appropriate biblical quotation to the picture. Last year at Temple Sinai in Los Angeles, 250 youngsters entered the photo competition and about 5,000 people viewed the final display.

Should not a multitude of words be answered? And is a talkative man always justified? Job, Chapter 11, Verse 2. [Shai Ginot photo]

"I think it re-invents the Bible and makes it relevant to them today," Majors said. The idea "is spreading like wildfire. Everybody's doing it."

Students at Toronto's Jewish day schools have been invited to submit their own photos and Bible quotes, said Diane Uslaner, director of the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

From 20 to 100 youngsters are expected to submit photos for the Children's Project, which will be located in the BJC's atrium, she added.

Schools in London, Ont., and Vancouver, as well as educational institutions in the United States, are participating in the project, Majors said.

The Bathurst Jewish Centre is located at 4588 Bathurst St.

Think before you speak, says author-rebbitzen

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There are times when it's permissible to lie, but lashon hara (evil speech, such as gossip) is always a serious transgression in Judaism, says a Toronto author and rebbitzen.

Lori Palatnik recently discussed Jewish speech ethics at the Lipa Green Building in the second of a three-part series, titled Jewish Ethics in our Everyday Lives. The event was sponsored by the professions cabinet of UJA Federation.

The Talmud says that speaking badly about another is like killing three people – the speaker, the listener and the subject, said Palatnik, wife of Rabbi Yaakov Palatnik of the Village Shul. The couple will be moving to Boca Raton, Fla., in June to establish a branch of Aish HaTorah there.

Lori Palatnik

It's worse to listen to lashon hara than to speak it, said Palatnik. She advised the audience to follow "that funny feeling inside…If you go with your soul, you will never go wrong."

On a more practical level, Palatnik said listeners could walk away, change the subject, or say (presumably in the same pleasant tone she used) that they really don't want to hear about it.

If they can't walk away – say they're in a moving car or at a Seder table – and the other options don't work, Palatnik suggested tuning out or not believing what is said, "but it's very hard to be on that level."

Another option is to counter the speaker by giving the subject the benefit of the doubt. "Remember in high school, the girl who was so stuck up? The girl who was a snob? It turns out she was shy and insecure…You don't know what goes on behind closed doors or in a person's heart."

Questions from the audience punctuated Palatnik's fast-paced, interactive presentation, reflecting just how often speech ethics play a role in people's lives.

A small sampling:

- What do you do in the workplace, if you have to give a performance review?
- What if someone you care about is becoming involved with someone who has a bad track record?
- Is it still lashon hara if you don't use words?

Palatnik had all the answers:

- You can discuss people in performance reviews as long as there's a clear purpose and benefit – in this case ensuring the right person is in the right job.
- Know the difference between information and opinion when discussing a romantic involvement. "People are so quick to give an opinion and it can destroy people's lives."
- Lashon hara can be a look or gesture. No words are necessary.

And when is it okay to tell a lie? Under three circumstances: to avoid hurting someone's feelings, to minimize one's own accomplishments and for privacy.

Major expansion planned for Netanya hospital

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When this year's flu epidemic hit Israel, Netanya's Laniado Hospital was reported in the media to be operating at a 215 percent capacity.

"For the first time, every national newspaper carried Laniado Hospital on the front page," said international public relations director Chaim Fachler wryly.

Fachler was in Toronto to meet with Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital to discuss fund-raising.

There was so much publicity about the overcrowding that the Israeli government recognized that the facility is too small, and offered to provide matching funds for monies raised by the hospital for expansion.

The plan, said Fachler, is to build 100 new beds immediately, with a contingency plan for 500 more – a sizable increase from the current 250-bed capacity, but badly needed.

The new beds will help eliminate bottlenecks that develop because patients cannot be transferred to regular in-patient beds.

Laniado, Fachler said, is the only hospital in the area. It services more than a quarter of a million inhabitants. Its emergency department, open 24 hours a day, seven days a week, serves 50,000 people a year.

The hospital's "pride and joy," as Fachler described it, is the maternity department, which delivers more than 400 babies a month, "all absolutely gorgeous – each one," he enthused.

Because of its location in the centre of the country, Laniado is seen as a "safe" hospital. As a result, Fachler explained, it is "part of the Israel Defence Force's strategic planning for the multi-injured and for chemical warfare victims."

Accordingly, there are periodic, often unexpected, joint drills. "The last one was carried out with no advance warning, and they brought observers from Jordan. We got top marks."

Laniado was founded by the Sanz Rebbe, Rabbi Yehudah Yekutiel Halberstam, a Holocaust survivor who lost his wife and 11 children.

"He pledged that he would devote the rest of his life and all of his efforts to create in Israel the opposite of what he had experienced," said Fachler.

That is one reason that the first medical department to open, in 1976, was the maternity department, opened by the late Dr. Joseph Weil, a Torontonian who was working in Israel.

The hospital will accept every person, no matter their religion, colour or nationality, Fachler said, remembering the time a four-bed emergency room was occupied by haredi, secular, Ethiopian and Arab patients.

Laniado maintains the "moral and ethical views of its founder," Fachler said, with a no-strike policy. ("Disputes are settled around a table; that's unique in Israel, with its strong unions and socialist tradition.")

Fachler had no compunction about stating the hospital's position on the issue of abortion. "We do abortions when medical specialists say it is the right thing to do. There is an abortion committee that will consult on a moment's notice if the mother's life is in danger.

"On the other hand, we will not do it for social or economic reasons."

One of the newest sources of pride for the hospital is its in-vitro fertilization unit, which is the only program in Israel that functions strictly according to Halachah.

"The bottom line is that halachic guidelines for advanced medical technologies don't conflict but enhance medical treatment."

Because of the government's matching grant offer, Laniado is embarking on a $10-million fund-raising campaign, in Great Britain, the United States, Europe, Israel itself ("40 percent of our funds are raised in Israel, which is very unusual") and Canada.

Fachler praised Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital, especially its national president, David Brown, Toronto executive director Norene Azoulay and Quebec region chair Arthur Sanft. "Toronto is my favourite travel place. Its warmth and generosity is second to none."

A dinner draw is being planned in Toronto to celebrate the hospital's 25th anniversary, Azoulay said.

For more information, contact the Canadian Friends office, 3101 Bathurst St., Suite 600, phone 416-785-8946, fax 416-785-9236, or e-mail laniado@better.net.

Teen musicians to headline at Baycrest Centre

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Daniel Grains, 13, and his brother Ilan, who will soon turn 12, do a lot of playing, but you won't find Nintendo or computer games at their house.

The Grains are aspiring young musicians who play piano and wind instruments. The brothers practise three to four hours a day and don't have much time for video and computer games, says their father David Grains.

The boys recently played at the Royal York Hotel and at a lunch-time concert at Roy Thompson Hall. Every other Sunday you can find them playing duets in the main lobby at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The brothers are the warm-up act for more established musicians who come to Baycrest, but on March 15 at 7 p.m., they'll be the headliners in the Abe Posluns Auditorium, the centre's main concert venue.

Ilan, who began playing piano some five years ago, says initially he didn't have a real feel for the music. "I didn't understand it. My father helped us interpret the music…Now we're starting to interpret it ourselves."

Ilan admits that when he first started, he didn't like practising. "I have to thank my father for pushing me into playing. Now it's more of an enjoyment."

Excelling in musicianship "is 95 percent commitment," says David Grains. "The parents have to encourage children one way or another, to see that the children put in the time. Without the commitment – talent or no talent – you're not going to get anywhere."

David attributes his own interest in music to his family's musical roots. "My father was a violinist in Russia and Israel, my sister is a flutist and another sister teaches piano in New York."

He says he found the boys' piano teacher, Alexander Veprinsky – Daniel and Ilan were seven and six respectively when they started – through an ad in The CJN. "He turned out to be a great teacher. He's demanding, serious and he wants a commitment."

The brothers began their wind instrument training at Allenby Public School in the Eglinton and Avenue Road area. Dan started on the flute and moved through the program so quickly that he took his Grade 4 exams at the Royal Conservatory of Music after only one year of study.

In September, he graduated to the oboe. "It's a very hard instrument. Not too many people actually play it successfully," Daniel says. "It's a double reed instrument. If I play it well, I'll hopefully play it in other places. There's lots of flutists around."

Ilan began studying the clarinet last year.

He says that winning a music competition about three years ago changed his attitude toward music. "The time I realized I liked it the most was at the Peel competition. It was my first competition and I came in in first place."

He says he was so excited about winning in his age category and getting the recognition that it spurred him to practise more. "I wanted to get the awards."

At this year's Kiwanis Music Festival Ilan got first place and Daniel got second in their respective categories in piano. In last month's Pickering Metro East Music Festival, they played duets and placed first.

The boys have earned money at concerts. They also go busking on Yonge Street to earn pocket money, Daniel says, noting that in two or three hours on the street, they were able to earn all their spending money for their last trip to Israel.

The two brothers say they get along like regular brothers, getting into fights and arguments when they're not on stage. For example, if one plays the wind instrument and the other is on piano, they says it's not uncommon for the brother on wind to use his free leg to kick the brother seated at the piano.

Daniel (left), and Ilan Grains are seen playing duets in the lobby of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

But they insist they know how to conduct themselves on stage."When we're playing we're like one."

Performing at Baycrest has also helped them become more comfortable performing in public, the brothers say.

They began playing there three years ago. While waiting for their older sister who volunteers there, they played the piano in the lobby. They were later invited to play at the centre on Sundays.

"I like playing there because I see other people enjoying the music," Daniel says. "When my father came to Canada [from Israel] the Jewish community helped him. Now we're giving [something] back."

"When we see people enjoying the music, it gives us satisfaction," says Ilan. "Seeing other people enjoying our music gives us a reason to practise."

Teen brings joy to Baycrest

Giselle Revah

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sixteen-year-old Giselle Revah vividly remembers the first time she played the violin at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

While she performed, Revah saw a woman's foot tapping. When Revah looked up, to her surprise, she saw that the entire upper half of the woman's body was slumped over.

"There were no signs of life in the upper half of her body – her eyes were blank. Her head was hung over, and yet her foot was tapping to the music so I knew I was making a difference in her life and bringing her some sort of joy," she said.

Since that day back in September, Revah has performed almost every Sunday at Baycrest.

In January, Revah was awarded the 1999 gold medal for strings by RCM Examinations, a division of The Royal Conservatory of Music. She was awarded the medal because she scored the highest mark on her performance exam – out of all the strings students receiving their Performer's ARCT, the highest level in The Royal Conservatory of Music program.

Revah's violin career began at the tender age of three. Her sister Ayala, who is 12 years older, played the violin and little Giselle desperately wanted to play too.

> 'I knew I was making a difference'

During her first violin lesson, she was given a cutout of a violin and a stick. She pretended to play a violin so she would become accustomed to the posturing and to the positioning of her hand.

"I remember my excitement at even getting the cutout of the violin. I thought, finally, I will get to make music," Revah said.

About a week after this lesson, she got her first real violin and began practising 15 minutes each day. By the time she was 11 years old, she was practising three hours daily to prepare for competitions.

But her violin lessons taught her about more than just making music.

Her second violin teacher told her that with a difficult piece, she should tackle the hardest parts first, try slowly to perfect these sections and then try to play them quickly.

"Now, even with schoolwork, instead of postponing the most difficult part, I tackle it first and really spend time working on it," she said.

Playing the violin has taught her discipline, dedication and patience, she said.

For example, when she is tackling a math problem and cannot solve it one way, then she will try it another way – persistence she feels she has acquired by playing the violin.

The violin has also given her confidence, she says.

"I'm not afraid to talk in public or act on stage. With so much practice in going on stage, I don't have stage fright," she said.

While Revah sometimes hates practising, she loves performing.

"The violin has given me so much and I want to be able to give back to people the joy the violin has given me," she said.

Through benefit concerts, Revah has raised more than $10,000 for breast cancer research, inflammatory bowel disease research and various charitable organizations.

Revah performs every second Sunday at 12:30 at The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"Shopping for a swimsuit used to be my worst nightmare.

Before I began designing swimwear, I dreaded shopping for a bathing suit. In fact, I once consumed an entire box of champagne truffles while a sales clerk passed style after style into the changeroom.

Hey, we've all been there!

That's why I created the Sun Goddess Gear collection that allows you to build an entire travel wardrobe around great-fitting swimwear.

It's called Sun Goddess Gear because if you can't feel like a 'Goddess' when you're on vacation, then when can you?

The idea is that you take four or five swimsuits with you on your vacation and the rest of your wardrobe is made up of the coordinating pieces. Because the swimsuits can double as bodysuits, you'll fit everything you will need for a week-long vacation into just one carry-on bag!

Our 'Curvaceous Cut' is an innovation in swimwear that features a y-shaped crotch for a 'creep-free' zone in the derrière and a flattering leg cut that follows your natural curves.

I also make these same swimsuits in styles that can accommodate a prosthesis, since all women deserve to feel sexy in a swimsuit!

Happy travelling!"

Recognizing alternatives in Halachah desirable: Zohar

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The study of Halachah should lead to a higher moral sensibility and a recognition that human values count, says Rabbi Noam Zohar, director of the Centre of Excellence in Bioethics in the Department of Philosophy at Bar-Ilan University.

Rabbi Zohar, this year a faculty fellow at Harvard University Centre for Ethics and the Professions, will be speaking at various locations in Toronto on March 15 and 16. He recently spoke to The CJN in a telephone interview.

Seeing the halachic tradition as focusing on authority and obedience, taking pride in its inscrutability, is a misunderstanding of what Torah and Halachah are all about, he said.

Maimonides, in his Guide for the Perplexed, said that "attributing irrationality to God's commandments is a mental illness," Rabbi Zohar said.

In the last 500 to 600 years, Rabbi Zohar said, the pluralistic approach to Halachah has been denigrated, in favour of an "almost dogmatic" theology, that "seeks to diminish the human role in Halachah."

Jews should "cherish the fact that tradition is not univocal. We should listen to each other."

In the great debates between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, the views of Hillel were considered more praiseworthy, because he taught both views – beginning with those of Shammai. "That's Jewish tradition," Rabbi Zohar insisted.

On the other hand, he mused, there is the consideration of personal integrity. "Suppose there are two different halachic views on an issue. If one person co-operates with the other on the other's terms, does that compromise his or her integrity?"

Many debates centre around differing world views, he said. For instance, some arguments about assisted reproduction stem from different views of the relations between men and women in a marital relationship, Rabbi Zohar said.

Dr. Noam Zohar

A compassionate rabbi will deal with a thorny ethical issue by giving different viewpoints as well as his own. Ideally, people looking for guidance should be able to sort out the different ideas for themselves.

Obviously, he said, education is the way to deal with controversies, as opposed to blindly following a rabbinic ruling. "If you are looking for a cop-out from responsibility, that is not a religious ideal. It is not the rabbi one worships, but the One above."

Central to Jewish tradition is the willingness "to address concerns with an open mind and sincerity," he said.

All these considerations affect current problems in bioethics, including assisted suicide, assisted reproduction, and even brit milah, a topic rapidly coming to the fore of Jewish thought.

"It is not proper to reject questions out of hand," said Rabbi Zohar. "That is never called for, even if something has been done for thousands of years."

For instance, he said, you can't be in the paradoxical position of criticizing female genital mutilation (FGM), denying the defence of cultural acceptance, if you refuse to admit that in some respects, male circumcision is the same for Jews.

You must be prepared, he said, to face those people who say brit milah is also a Jewish cultural practice that causes pain and lessens sexual enjoyment – just as those who support FGM do.

"Rambam said that there may be a value to lessening sexual enjoyment," Rabbi Zohar pointed out.

The rabbi will be speaking on From Assisted Reproduction to Genetically Tailored Babies, Judaic and Philosophical Perspectives, at Beth Tzedec Congregation, March 15, 7:30 p.m.; on Does Religious Pluralism Mean Compromising One's Integrity, Three Contemporary Issues in Jewish Bioethics, at Adath Israel Congregation, March 16, 9 a.m.; and Gender and Justice in Contemporary Jewish Bioethics, at a noon luncheon for women at the home of Berl and Rebecca Nadler.

He will also be the keynote speaker at CHAT's Values and Morals Seminar Day, on March 15.

Chabad Lubavitch moves to downtown Toronto

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lubavitch is continuing its expansion throughout the GTA with its newest effort, Chabad of downtown.

At the helm, will be native New Yorker Rabbi Nechemia Deitsch, his wife Devorah, both in their early 20s, and their three-month-old son Menachem Mendel.

Rabbi Deitsch is no stranger to Toronto. In fact, he has been head counsellor at Camp Lubavitch, as well as doing general shiluchut work.

When he and Devorah were looking for someplace to settle as shiluchim – emissaries of the late Lubavitcher rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson – Toronto sprang to mind. Rabbi Dietsch found that there are 15,000 Jews south of St. Clair, besides students.

"Eighty percent of University of Toronto students commute. They don't just hang out [in Jewish locales], so I wanted to do something for them, and for the few hundred who live down there."

Rabbi Deitsch also wants to focus on the business and local residential communities.

The family took an apartment on Bedford Road, just north of Bloor, with room to host 10 to 20 guests for Shabbat.

"I want to show the Shabbat candles, what kiddush is – these things give a feeling for Yiddishkeit," he said.

He and his wife also plan to hold classes there, such as Hebrew language, how to daven, and practical Halachah. The classes will run during the day, at lunchtime, or whenever it is convenient for people to come.

Another project he has in mind is to bring programs on various topics to offices in the financial district. These might be the weekly parshah, chassidut, Kabbalah, or modern issues connected with Torah or Halachah.

Wanting to "do what is good for the community," Rabbi Deitsch said that he has made contact with Jewish Campus Services, and also with the Bloor JCC.

The first big program they are organizing is what he calls Purim in the Shtetl, complete with hay and a violinist. "It will be a very welcoming, very supportive atmosphere," with a meal, a Megillah reading (with a slide show illustrating what is going on in the story), arts and crafts, and mishloach manot.

Rabbi Nechemia and Devorah Deitsch, and their son Menachem Mendel.

Rabbi Deitsch is very excited about plans for a model matzah bakery at the Bloor JCC, much like the one at the Lubavitch Community Centre in Thornhill. It will not only be for local kids, but, he expects, for kids from the Junction, Beach and Riverdale communities.

The Deitsches also hope to have a model seder, as well as a proper seder to which they will invite people from the area.

"We want to encourage hands-on Jewish activities, so that people can live the Jewish religion, not just learn about it," he said.

At the moment, the rabbi said, he floats between the three Orthodox shuls near the apartment – the Kiever, the Minsker, and Shaarei Tzedec. Eventually, he would like to host his own minyan once a month or on holidays, and, ideally, every Shabbat.

There is no question that this is a family affair. His grandparents were shiluchim in Springfield, Mass. for many years, and his wife has done a good deal of work with children from unaffiliated homes, organizing Shabbatons and doing arts and crafts. Besides his experiences in Toronto, he himself has served in such exotic places as Hong Kong, Shanghai and the former Soviet Union.

Even the baby comes along. "He is a great help in breaking the ice," the rabbi said fondly.

One of his fondest dreams is to build a Jewish library in the downtown area. "I always felt that wherever I go I want books around me. Our apartment is like a library – I have over 650 books, on about 60 shelves."

There is a "thirst for Yiddishkeit around the world," he mused. "We believe that it is all tied up with the imminent coming of Mashiach, when the world will be filled with knowledge, like water covers the ocean."

Conference on feminism, Orthodoxy an intense experience

By REBECCA NADLER
Special to The CJN

Attending the Third International Conference on Feminism and Orthodoxy was an intense and tiring experience. Each day began just after eight with prayers, and ended well after six.

As I dragged myself onto the plane for the return trip to Toronto, I was left with a mix of conflicting emotions.

Comment

Exhaustion — I had spent two days meeting old friends and making new ones. The plenary sessions and the workshops offered too many learning opportunities. There were so many fascinating people to hear that it was impossible to hear them all. The solution: my bag was full of tapes from the sessions I wanted to go to but was unable to attend.

Exhilaration — The conference was attended by 2,000 women and men. The binding sentiment among the participants was the love of Torah and the thirst for knowledge and for the opportunity to enhance and strengthen their attachment to Judaism. We are parents, children and spouses and we cherish these roles, but we long for expanded opportunities for women within a halachic framework. We see this as a win-win opportunity for all of our communities. I am returning to Toronto invigorated.

Frustration — I have spent years listening to agunot, women begging for their freedom from recalcitrant husbands, men who refuse to give their wives a get, a Jewish divorce. As the numbers of agunot swell, I am deeply concerned at the apparent inability to find adequate halachic solutions to this growing problem. I pray for the day when I can go to a conference and not hear the horror stories of chained women unable to go on with their lives.

Solitude — I leave behind a community that I joined for two short days. I saw Orthodox Jews with varying philosophies and lifestyles come together and share ideas. I spent two days in a community that is attempting to respond to the moral decay in the general society by offering women meaningful and challenging roles within the halachic framework. Unfortunately, the response outside the conference walls is often one of defensive insulation and a further limiting of intellectual pursuit and freedom.

Hope — This conference attracted many more participants in their teens and 20s than I recall at previous conferences. Many young couples came with their infant children in tow. The next generation is getting actively involved.

Many presenters at the conference were young women whose knowledge of and comfort with biblical and rabbinic texts was virtually non-existent a generation ago. Ten or 15 years ago, female scholars worldwide were few and far between. Happily, at a time when the glass ceiling is shattering and women are excelling in all areas of secular knowledge, gradually the Orthodox community is responding to the challenge by encouraging women to excel in the study of our sacred texts. The growing fruits of these initiatives were well displayed at this conference. This offers great hope for the future of our people and its traditions.

Coping with the present

By MELANIE TAKEFMAN

Documenting the Holocaust is an urgent priority in the Jewish community, as the last generation of survivors grows older. However, when it comes to understanding modern Germany, we as Jews are often unable to see beyond the years 1933 to 1945.

Opinion

As the granddaughter of Holocaust survivors and as a Jew, I have long struggled with my perception of Germany.

My family actively boycotts German-made products. Moreover, the words "German" and "Nazi" are often used interchangeably among Jews and I have heard Volkswagens called "Nazi wagons" more than a few times. We are taught early that anything German is bad.

When I chose to study on the French/German border for a year, I knew that I would have to come to terms with the Germany issue. Not only is Strasbourg a few kilometres from the border, but, as a political pawn, it has been handed back and forth several times.

Living so close was a bit of a shock at first. Street signs here are bilingual, and on weekends, German tourists converse in their native tongue with speakers of the local Alsatian dialect.

For the first few weeks, I ignored the German culture around me. If I did not think about it, it would not harm me. When my mother came to visit, for example, we discussed possible day trips. Although the quaint towns near the border were the only viable options, we overlooked the land mass to the east as if it did not exist.

As I met more Germans, I became more confused. On the one hand, I liked my new acquaintances. They were certainly not Nazis; instead, most felt deeply remorseful about the crimes of the past.

On the other hand, remnants of Nazism abound here. Outside a downtown shopping centre, a plaque commemorates the spot where the main synagogue was burned down.

"The ground here is fertile with Jewish blood," one local Jew told me.

Yet I came to Strasbourg to study history. I strongly believe that history is only useful if we can learn from the mistakes of the past. And if we have learned anything from the past, it is that ignorance is dangerous.

Instead of shunning Germany, we must study its rich history. We must understand the social conditions that resulted in the Holocaust and look at how Germany has rapidly rebuilt itself into a thriving nation at the forefront of the European Union. At the same time, we must remain vigilant of warning signs, to ensure that history does not repeat itself.

Granted, I will never forget what took place in Germany. I feel it when someone yells schnell (fast) a little too earnestly and I felt it when I took a crammed train from Munich to visit the concentration camp near Dachau. However, we must not blame today's Germans for the sins of 60 years ago.

Like it or not, Germany has undergone radical transformations since World War II. No matter how many of us boycott or refuse to visit, we cannot undo the past. By avoiding Germany, we put a band-aid on the wound, instead of letting it heal.

Melanie Takefman is a student from Montreal who is studying in Strasbourg.

Zionism: The next generation

By SIGAL KONIG
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Ninety students from the United States and Canada were called "first trial guinea pigs" earlier this month, when they attended the first program in a newly established Zionist leadership initiative for Jewish North American students.

The three-day program, spearheaded by Naftali Raz, the New York-based shaliach with the University Student Division (USD), an arm of the Hagshama department of the World Zionist Organization (WZO), was held in New York City.

The aim of the new young Zionist leadership program is to encourage and foster the development of young Jewish leadership among university students in North America.

At the recent session, Chaim Chayet, head of the Hagshama department, and Jon Malki, national resource director of USD/Hagshama, expressed their confidence to the students about the future of Jewish activism in North America. They emphasized the importance of student involvement within their respective communities.

Other speakers during the three days included Gadi Taub, Israeli journalist with the Israeli daily Ma'ariv, and Jacob Even, a brigadier-general and former IDF spokesperson, who talked about the peace process and updated students on the Israeli-Syrian peace track.

The second program in the initiative will be held at the beginning of April in San Francisco, and a subsequent program is planned for Israel this summer.

For more information, contact Naftali Raz, toll free, at 1-800-27-ISRAEL.

McGill student combats stereotypes in New York

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Lara Kwinter visited a New York high school to talk about Judaism and the Holocaust, a student raised his hand and asked: "Why are Jews cheap?"

Kwinter and fellow presenter Leanne Trapedo-Sims explained that this was an example of a stereotype and that not all Jews are cheap.

Kwinter, a 21-year-old art history major studying at McGill University, was the only Canadian intern last semester at the Museum of Jewish Heritage – A Living Memorial to the Holocaust, in New York.

As part of the internship, university students visit high schools and middle schools to teach students about the Holocaust, Judaism and the museum's exhibits. The interns then act as tour guides when those classes come to the museum, and they visit the class again afterward to speak to students about what they have seen.

While the program does not target specific groups, the students Kwinter taught were predominantly black or Hispanic.

Visiting classrooms for the first time, Kwinter had to address stereotypes about Jews.

For instance, she said, many students thought all Jews dress like the Orthodox Jews they see on the subway.

"Some of them did not even know there were Jews who did not wear black hats and long skirts and long sleeves – they would say [to us], 'You don't look Jewish'".

Most of the students were genuinely interested in learning, Kwinter said. But once, after Kwinter showed a class a slide presentation introducing them to the Holocaust, to Judaism and to some of the museum's artifacts, a student raised his hand and said his great-grandparents were slaves and horrible things happened to them. What made the presentation relevant to him, he wanted to know. Why should he listen to it?

Kwinter and her partner were prepared for this and most other critical comments, including Holocaust denial.

During the interns' two-week training in August, they were told about the time an intern was making a presentation to a class and a student said, "I'm not listening to this. My parents told me the Holocaust never happened," and turned his chair around.

"I was always nervous something like that would happen – it never did," Kwinter said.

Ninety-nine percent of the museum's artifacts are donated, said Abby Spilka, public relations manager for the museum. Kwinter said her tours often took on special meaning when the group realized that the owner of an artifact was standing right near it.

Once, when Kwinter was showing a group the Children's Gallery, they were looking at a letter written by a little girl who had been sent to England to escape the Nazis. A woman standing close to the letter with her daughter said, "That's my letter," and then spoke to the group about it.

"It was such an experience for the students to hear about this letter from the person who wrote it," Kwinter said.

Another time, when the students were watching real footage of Hitler youth singing anti-Semitic songs in the streets, a man walking by said he remembered his non-Jewish friends singing songs like that and he spoke to the group about his experiences.

Kwinter, who hopes to work in the education department of a museum, said this internship made her realize that her true calling is working in a museum, rather than in an art gallery, as she had planned.

"I realized it would be a good place to teach children," she said.

Montreal students enthusiastic about Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Young Jewish Montrealers just back from a 10-day, all-expenses paid, trip to Israel are effusive about what they saw and learned.

They say the experience has had a significant impact on their sense of what it means to be Jewish.

Two hundred Montreal Jews, aged 19 to 26, who had never been on an organized, Zionist-oriented trip, were selected by lottery from about 725 applications for the inaugural year of Birthright Israel.

"I kissed the ground when I arrived because we saw Israelis doing it, but I didn't understand what it meant until I left," said 19-year-old Amy Lilien, a McGill University student.

A highlight for her was celebrating Shabbat on a beach with other young Canadians and Israelis, spontaneously singing and dancing.

"It was like being on a high." Her reaction surprised her because she had come to Israel believing that those with "extreme faith" are a little crazy.

Lilien, who is from Toronto, said her trip was enhanced by having 10 Israeli young people, from Beersheva, the Negev city linked with Montreal through Partnership 2000, among her busload of 40.

"Seeing the country through the eyes of those who were six months to a year away from being drafted into the army was one of the best parts of the trip," she said.

Coast to Coast

Don't underestimate Manning

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

While his front bench, led by feisty Diane Ablonczy is still busily attacking the government, Preston Manning is in the midst of a cross-country tour.

We will, for the moment, ignore the issue of how the Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition can absent himself from the House during such a critical juncture in this Parliament.

Instead, we should consider exactly what is preoccupying Manning. The ostensible answer is that he is busily drumming up support for CAP (Canadian Alliance Party).

"Think Big" is the mantra that Manning has been repeating ever since the twin conventions that fuelled the CAP Express ended in victory. "Canada is a big country," he explains, "requiring big ideas, big tax breaks and big changes to the way government is done."

Some complacent journalists and political pundits have responded with a "big deal!" They dismiss the CAP Express as little more than new packaging for an old turkey.

Big mistake!

Manning has begun to demonstrate the extent of his ruthless and relentless determination to become prime minister. He has applied the screws to both his caucus and party executive. He has eliminated any challenge to his leadership and even supporters of Stockwell Day concede that he has almost no chance against Manning.

With great care Manning is orchestrating a flawless scenario to make a most serious bid to win the government.

So why would he not be in Ottawa claiming centre stage in the Shovelgate feeding frenzy? What could offer him a more compelling stage to contrast himself and his party from that of the Liberal government?

The answer lies in our collective and chronic "Manning blind spot." Time after time, his political savvy is underestimated, and each time, he advances one step closer to power. He understands the dynamics of the political arena.

The public will ultimately tire of the $1-billion scandal at the Human Resources Department. They will tire of the images of Ablonczy pounding away relentlessly at Jane Stewart. Soon, Stewart will begin to look like the victim.

That is not the image Manning wants to convey. In the shift from opposition to government, he must project trust and wisdom, which are not usually qualities associated with question period sound bites televised on the evening news. One thing is for sure: Preston has awfully "big" ambitions.

Peres, Chrétien to address CIC conference

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Shimon Peres will be the guest of honour at the Canada-Israel Committee's 16th parliamentary dinner, and the keynote address will be given by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien.

The dinner will be the culmination of a day-long policy conference to be held at the Ottawa Congress Centre on Wednesday, March 29.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) is mandated to represent the views and concerns of the organized Jewish community regarding Canada's Middle East foreign policy, and to promote Canada-Israel bilateral relations.

The agency seeks to promote strong and positive links between Canada and Israel, and is involved in programs aimed at various levels of government, in addition to regular lobbying and advocacy efforts. The CIC also provides information to both the English and French press and monitors the media regularly.

"The community has a unique opportunity to gather in numbers from coast to coast to discuss the issues of the day relating to Canada-Israel relations and to meet its political representatives in the nation's capital," says Rob Ritter, CIC national executive director. "Members of the Jewish community are provided with an opportunity to experience the broad support Israel enjoys in Canada."

Politicians and media representatives have been invited to the conference as guests of honour, and many will be speaking at sessions throughout the day.

The conference will open with statements by the political parties of Canada. "It is very important for the Jewish community to hear firsthand each party's position on Israel and the Middle East," Ritter says.

Lloyd Axworthy, minister of foreign affairs, will be the keynote speaker at the luncheon.

Three CIC board members will be dinner chairs: Stephen Victor of Ottawa, Donald Carr of Toronto, and Stephen Lipper of Montreal.

"As Israel moves forward towards complex final status issues with the Palestinians and as it explores the possibility of formal peace with Syria," says Ritter, "it is vital that we demonstrate our support for Israel through the strength of our numbers."

Special air fare and hotel rates have been arranged for conference participants and a chartered bus will be leaving from Toronto.

For information, contact the CIC national office in Ottawa at 613-234-8271.

Hadassah-WIZO head puts small Jewish communities on agenda

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Small Jewish communities in Canada are a major issue for Marion Mayman.

The recently installed national president of Canadian Hadassah WIZO is seeking ways to motivate diminishing memberships in the Atlantic provinces and in smaller communities throughout the country.

"Our membership goal is to find new members and retain older ones," said the Ottawa woman, in Halifax to meet with members of Halifax Hadassah WIZO which was at one time vibrantly active, but is now slipping into a dormant state.

"We want members to feel Hadassah is their organization," she stressed.

"We want them to talk to us," she said, emphasizing that any suggestions received on Hadassah issues will be taken very seriously.

Mayman, elected in November, has set a goal to meet with each Hadassah centre in her first year in office.

"It may not be possible, but I'm certainly going to try."

A native of Sydney, N.S., Mayman has lived in Ottawa for 12 years where she was president of Agudath Israel Synagogue, Ottawa JNF, and a vice-president of Canadian Jewish Congress, representing the national capital area. She was also an international officer with United Synagogues of Conservative Judaism. She has also lived in Winnipeg, Montreal and Israel with her husband, Shlomo.

Mayman's first official duties as Hadassah president involved attending the World WIZO Conference in January in Israel and the Southern Regional Conference for Hadassah WIZO (mostly for Canadian snowbirds) in Florida.

"This is my first official visit to a Hadassah centre," she said of her visit to Halifax. "I will be in Montreal in April, Toronto in May and, in July, will travel to Calgary and Vancouver. Plus I'll stop in smaller communities, too, in the next few months."

Hadassah WIZO has 15,000 members in Canada, a constant number in the last few years. However, due to an aging membership, many aren't active or hold life memberships.

"We're trying to re-activate many of those women," she said, "but we're trying to convince younger members they can be part of something worthwhile."

With a mandate to help women and children in Israel have a better life, Canadian Hadassah WIZO supports Israeli residential schools, hospitals, medical programs and areas of spousal and child abuse.

"We're a very modern organization, tackling modern issues. We just haven't done a good job selling ourselves. We have to remind the grassroots chapters of the good work they can help us do."

She said the parents and grandparents of younger Jewish community members are involved.

"Now we have to convince younger women, who we know in their hearts support Israel, to do something tangible and join our programs. Even though many are busy with careers and families, there are ways they can plan their time to help us do good volunteer work. We're even suggesting job-sharing in the volunteer world, similar to what is happening in business."

Many women in smaller communities, like Sydney and Regina, are getting more involved with the general community.

"In Sydney, the women do a bazaar but recruit involvement from the general community. In Regina, Hadassah holds an anti-violence day but tie in police and social workers."

These communities, and other small ones, do an amazing amount of work, she said.

Balfour Beach celebrates 55th anniversary

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Times have changed at Balfour Beach. Jeans, rather than cocktail dresses, are now the rule at the "rec hall" and people don't bake in the sun the way they used to.

But after more than half a century, life goes on for this Lake Simcoe summer community.

As in the past, open air services for Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Friday night services are held beside Lake Simcoe, when the weather is suitable. Otherwise people daven in the "rec hall."

Once the ritziest summer place, the beach community – it has 60 cottages – will be celebrating its 55th anniversary the weekend of July 29. About 200 cottagers are expected to come and reminisce at the anniversary.

Balfour Beach became a hub of Toronto's Jewish community and in its early days was considered a place of luxury and social pre-eminence. Its history is replete with a who's who of Toronto Jewry.

In 1945, the late Rose Dunkelman of the Tip Top Tailors family, founded the summer colony named after the British author of the Balfour Declaration on Palestine.

Her interest in children, and that of her husband David, who owned the land, is carried on through Camp Katonim (Hebrew for little ones) a day camp at Balfour Beach for 130 campers. About 40 percent of the children now come by bus from Toronto, Thornhill and Richmond Hill. Some campers are brought daily by parents with cottages on other parts of the lake.

200 cottagers expected

"Katonim is a day camp that has the feeling and waterfront activities of an overnight camp with a staff of 40," said Terry Cohen, an anniversary committee member. "The advantage is that the campers can have dinner with their own families at the end of the day."

Anne Sniderman, 85, and her husband Dr. Harold Sniderman, 89, are among the original residents. "We only go up on the weekends now, but it's a nice break from the city," Anne Sniderman told The CJN. Her husband, an ophthalmologist, is about to retire, she said.

Harold and Anne Sniderman

Their children, Dr. Barry Sniderman, also an ophthalmologist, Dr. Ken Sniderman, a radiologist, and daughter Nancy Fried, along with their nine children, are among the regular visitors at the Snidermans' five-bedroom cottage.

Among the longtime residents are Joan Waxman, Judy Berg, Robert Cohen, Tony Leibel and Celia Eisenberg.

Some new members include Lorne Michaels, the producer of Saturday Night Live; Jeffrey Lyons, vice-chair of the Toronto Police Service Board; and Toronto surgeon, Dr. Ron Zuker.

Stavros: lasting quality, always abreast of the times

Master tailor Stavros Theodoropoulos and his partner Robert Kennedy are often asked to compare prices with those of other tailors. They invariably refuse; it's simply not apples to apples.

Most men's wear providers offer a department store scenario, but Stavros is a boutique. Each dollar you spend here buys more than it would anywhere else. Stavros is an artist; every suit he crafts is a work of art, uniquely tailored to you, the wearer. No two garments are the same.

Think of Stavros and his staff as a chamber orchestra, with a core group that can add extra musicians as needed. Yet the ensemble always stays small enough to allow the maestro and his partner to supervise it directly.

From conception through creation, each Stavros suit represents some 50 hours of fine hand craftsmanship. Each suit must pass Stavros' personal inspection, and the tailors who cut, sew and finish it are present when you're fitted.

Stavros and his staff are a motivated, disciplined team. The timeless quality of Stavros' work, and his high standards of service, are embodied by each and every person you deal with. Your garment will always be the best that it can be — right down to the last buttonhole — and it will always be up to date.

From the work room (left) where garments are created to the elegant showroom (right), attention to detail is paramount

And Stavros stands behind his work. Twice a year for three years, under his supervision, your suit is hand-cleaned and pressed free of charge. This timely service is just one of the many little "extras" that help him maintain a rapport with his clients.

Stavros is delighted with the response to his new cutting-edge layout and decor, with its spacious brightness and warm colors. When not ensconced in its inviting confines, he and Kennedy are abroad, keeping abreast of the times and what their clients want. Twice a year, they visit New York, London and Milan to source out new fashion developments.

This year's look is light. You'll see more lightweight fabrics, woven from stronger but finer European yarns. Colors are brighter, including pastel ties and shirts — a welcome sight after years of grey and black.

And people who enjoy dressing up are dressing up more. For example, a lot more men are wearing French cuffs. These and other subtle details are best entrusted to a Master Tailor like Stavros who can do them full justice. In his hands, your suit becomes an investment that will reap maximum dividends not only in terms of your personal and professional image, but also in the sheer satisfaction and comfort that comes with wearing a perfectly tailored garment.

Winnipeg Jewish cultural institutions team up for concert

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the first time ever, Winnipeg's two best known Jewish cultural institutions are collaborating in concert. The Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble and Finjan are ringing in the millennium together on March 14, with an evening of music, song and dance.

"We have tried to make our yearly concerts more interesting by working with guest artists from time to time," says Tamar Barr, Chai's artistic director. "It seemed fitting, since this is our double chai anniversary and Finjan's chai year, that we work together this year."

The Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble was formed in 1964 by the late Sarah Sommer with about half a dozen Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate students.

It has grown into one of North America's most prominent Israeli dance troupes. Chai has toured across Canada and has been invited to appear in Israel and Mexico.

Finjan is an internationally known klezmer band which was originally formed in 1982 in the hope of playing at the Winnipeg Folk Festival. Although band members have married and developed independent careers, five of the original six members are still part of Finjan.

At the March 14 concert, the two groups will be collaborating on four pieces including the Dancing on Water suite and Rumainishe Kretchma from Finjan's new Dancing on Water CD that will be available for sale after the show.

Two of the dance numbers were choreographed by Shai Gottesman, artistic director of Hora Neurim Yerushalayim. Gottesman and his Israeli dance troupe appeared with Chai at the Winnipeg Jewish community's Israel pavillion at Folklorama in the summer of 1998.

"It was a privilege to have worked with Shai in 1998," says Tamar. "We wanted to bring him back."

For Barr and Chai general director Casey Chisick, this will be their last Chai concert. Both are leaving at the end of the season. Chisick has been part of Chai for 11 years, Barr for 20.

"It is tough to leave," Barr says. "I have mixed feelings. I am proud of what we have accomplished and built up, but it is time to move on."

Assad has 'intermittent dementia':CIA

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli and American intelligence agencies are locked in dispute over Syrian President Hafez Assad's medical condition.

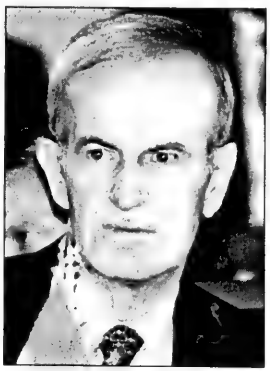
A CIA report, recently handed over to Israel, states that Assad is stricken with "intermittent dementia." Israeli Military Intelligence, however, does not approve of the manner in which this diagnosis was made – through a compilation of reports by people who have met Assad personally and those who have heard of fluctuations in his coherence and ability to concentrate.

The dictionary definition of dementia is "a condition of deteriorated mentality, often with emotional apathy" and is usually treated by psychiatric and geriatric physicians.

There are those in the Israeli defence establishment who do indeed agree with this definition and a senior official recently compared Assad to a "stuffed animal." But Military Intelligence believes that a proper diagnosis can only be made via medical methods that are currently beyond the CIA's reach.

Furthermore, Intelligence believes that Assad's health does not bear any real weight on his ability to maintain his rule and make decisions, such as an agreement with Israel or the transfer of power to his son Bashar.

Nonetheless, Assad's health is an important issue for both Prime Minister Ehud Barak and American President Bill Clinton in the final stage of trying to secure an Israel-Syria agreement.



Syrian President Hafez Assad

At such a final stage, two meetings between Assad and Barak are likely. The first, possibly in Geneva, is meant as an ice-breaker between the two hostile states. The second, in Washington or some other American location, will be attended by Clinton in an attempt to achieve a Camp David-type agreement, and will seek to finalize arrangements made behind the scenes by representatives from the three countries. Such a meeting would last only a day or two.

Following Barak's request of President Hosni Mubarak to help on the Syria-Israel channel, reports from Cairo say that the Syrian insistence on basing the borders on the "June 4, 1967 line" and not the "international line" is linked to Syria's continued renunciation of the borders drawn by the British and French mandatory forces in the 1920s between Syria and Turkey in the north, Lebanon to the east and Palestine to the south.

Israeli intelligence estimates Assad's lifespan to be anywhere between "a day to two years" and when asked for a more exact estimate, they state that Assad's end will probably come closer to a "day" than to "two years."

Less than six weeks before the death of King Hussein of Jordan, intelligence estimated that Assad would last between a "year to three."

Following discussions over the methods used to arrive at the estimates reached by Director of Military Intelligence Major General Amos Malka, the estimate was adjusted to "zero to three years."

Israeli intelligence believes that key Assad colleagues, and others holding powerful positions in the Syrian regime, are in fact in favour of peace with Israel.

They believe that if Assad does sign an agreement with Israel, it will be honoured by his successors, even if he dies only a short time after the signing. This theory is also supported by leaders and senior officials in the Arab states bordering Israel, including Mubarak and King Abdullah of Jordan.

Senior defence officials believe that if Israel rejects a "fair offer" from Syria for a peace agreement, the American administration could severely limit the provision of weapons to the IDF.

Knesset bill may hurt peace deal with Syria

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's Knesset has taken a step that could kill the chances of a peace deal with Syria.

In an additional blow to the political fortunes of Prime Minister Ehud Barak, three parties in his governing coalition supported the opposition-sponsored bill in a recent vote.

The bill requires that a referendum by Israelis on a withdrawal from the Golan Heights be approved by more than 50 percent of all eligible voters rather than by the more easily attainable majority of those who actually vote.

Barak had pledged to hold the referendum when and if he reaches a final peace deal with Damascus.

If passed, the bill would mean that if 80 percent of the electorate turns out to vote in the referendum – a typical Israeli turnout – more than 60 percent of the voters would have to approve it for the peace treaty to go into effect.

At present, according to the polls, the public's support in the referendum – even if only a majority of those actually voting is required – is by no means assured.

A peace treaty with Syria has to go through three stages: cabinet approval, passage by 61 of the 120 Knesset members and the referendum.

The legislation must still pass additional Knesset votes and two committees before becoming law. That process can take months, and the bill may never reach that stage.

Community charities praise federal budget

For its part, CJC commended the budget's enhancement of child tax benefits and the doubling of parental leave under the Employment Insurance program, as well as its bolstering of programs aimed at Canadians with disabilities.

"On the other hand," said Eric Vernon, CJC's director of government relations, "Canadians are very concerned about health care, and although the budget takes major steps toward restoring levels of transfer payments [to provinces], we hoped the government would have provided more money for health care, a national child care strategy and social housing."

In a pre-budget letter to Martin, CJC president Moshe Ronen and Sheva Medjuck, chair of CJC's social action committee, called on Ottawa to restore levels of transfer payments for health and social programs, and consider new programs, including home care and initiatives aimed at reducing poverty.

Israel declares July exit by IDF from Lebanon

Environment Minister Dalia Itzik called for a unified stance on Lebanon, and warned that contradictory statements by the different ministers on this issue would lead to confusion among the public.

Tourism Minister Amnon Lipkin-Shahak noted that the anticipated withdrawal from Lebanon was affecting the morale of IDF troops, and he called for Israel to move more quickly towards a peace agreement with the Palestinians, despite the fact that it is not certain whether a final status accord can be achieved within the next six months.

Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh supported the prime minister's call to redeploy the IDF by July, but warned against continued Hezbollah activity.

Haider's resignation seen as a ploy

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — Joerg Haider's unexpected resignation as head of Austria's far-right Freedom Party is widely seen as a strategic ploy that may ultimately win him more political power – including the nation's leadership.

Analysis

"It is important not to overestimate" the move, Marta Halpert, director of the Anti-Defamation League's Vienna-based Central European office, told JTA.

"It is a tactical move designed to take a little pressure off the government. The question is whether it will be acknowledged.

"Haider's influence remains," she said. "The party is not headless."

Haider announced his resignation as leader of the Freedom Party, known as the FPO, during a closed-door meeting of the party leadership recently.

Explaining the move, he said he wanted to concentrate on his job as governor of Austria's southern state of Carinthia.

He turned the party leadership over to close aide Susanne Riess-Passer, who serves as vice-chancellor in the center-right coalition led by Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel.

Haider, who himself is not a member of the cabinet, told a news conference recently that the "double commitment" of being party leader and governor was "too much for anyone."

But he also said he had no intention of disappearing permanently.

"I want to make clear that I am not running away from national politics, just making a new constellation in our party leadership," he said.

Asked if he still hoped to be chancellor one day, he replied: "I do not exclude it."

The entry of the Freedom Party into government Feb. 4 polarized the country. It triggered domestic and foreign protests, including diplomatic isolation by Austria's 14 European Union partners and other countries, including Israel.

The Freedom Party won 27 percent of the vote in Austria's elections last October, becoming the country's second largest party and the strongest far-right force in Europe.

The party ran on an anti-immigrant, law-and-order platform. Haider, the son of Nazi sympathizers, won notoriety in past years by praising aspects of Hitler's Nazi Reich. He has repeatedly apologized for the remarks.

Haider's resignation did not impress foreign leaders. Israel, which withdrew its ambassador to Vienna even before the new government was sworn in, said it would not return its envoy.

Asked if the ambassador would return, Foreign Minister David Levy told reporters recently, "Unequivocally, no."

The prime minister of Portugal, whose country holds the rotating EU presidency, was also far from impressed by the resignation.

"The problem is not Joerg Haider, but what his party represents," Anotonio Guterres said.

A spokesperson for the German Foreign Ministry was skeptical that the resignation would be enough to change the European Union's isolation of Austria, adding, "Our position is unchanged."

The United States said it would closely monitor developments.

Haider's resignation "doesn't change our concerns. The Freedom Party is still part of the government," said State Department spokesperson, James Rubin.

"We will react swiftly and firmly to any statements or actions suggesting sympathy with Nazi-era policies, or that express racism, xenophobia or anti-Semitism," he said.

Haider denied that he was stepping down as the result of political pressure.

"We are accustomed to making our own decisions," he said.

For most Austrians, the charismatic 50-year-old politician is the embodiment of the FPO.

Haider took over party leadership in 1986 and, with his populist policies playing on xenophobia, promising a return to traditional values. He transformed the party from a minuscule political force into the country's second largest party.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 28

• Foreign Minister David Levy fought off a parliamentary no-confidence motion submitted by Arab parties over his recent fiery rhetoric against Hezbollah. During the debate, Levy called Hezbollah a "crazy organization whose declared purpose is to spill the blood of Jews." The Knesset defeated the no-confidence motion, 58-8.

• Veteran Israeli cartoonist Kariel Gardos, whose cap-wearing character Srulik became a symbol of Israel, died of cardiac arrest at the age of 78. Gardos, known as "Dosh," was a Hungarian-born Holocaust survivor who became a political caricaturist for Ma'ariv.

Feb. 29

• U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross admitted that he has failed to end a month-long deadlock in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

March 1

• Military officials jailed a soldier for four weeks for refusing to serve in southern Lebanon.

March 2

• At least two suspected Palestinian militants were killed when Israeli security forces tried to storm the building where they were hiding in an Arab town near Tel Aviv. One militant was arrested, and a member of Israel's anti-terror squad had his foot amputated after he was injured by an explosion.

March 3

• Israeli Holocaust and art experts suggested that museums exhibiting Nazi-looted art keep the works, as long as they explain how they were stolen from Jews.

Eichmann memoirs may discredit Holocaust denial

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Five large envelopes containing a 1,105-page memoir in the archaic Gothic handwriting of Adolf Eichmann may now hold the key to a dramatic libel trial currently being played out in London.

The memoir, written while Eichmann, chief engineer of the Holocaust, was in an Israeli jail awaiting execution in 1962, following his landmark trial, has been locked away in Israel's National Archive for more than 35 years.

Now this document has been given new life and, unwittingly, new purpose in the hands of lawyers in London who are defending U.S. Holocaust scholar, Deborah Lipstadt.

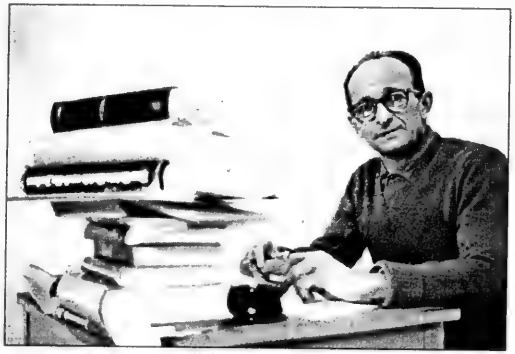
Lipstadt is being sued by Holocaust revisionist David Irving, who claims he was libeled by Lipstadt in her 1994 book Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, published in Britain by Penguin Books.

Irving, who denies that Auschwitz was a death camp and insists that the number of Jewish victims has been grossly inflated, maintains that his career was wrecked after allegedly being accused by Lipstadt of distorting historical data to suit his ideological perspective and being labelled a Holocaust denier.

Under British libel law, the onus of proof is on Lipstadt to show that her contentions are accurate: She has to prove that Irving possessed information about the Holocaust that he deliberately distorted, selected or suppressed to suit his own purposes.

Irving is making full use of this advantage in the courtroom by simply claiming that he is not an expert in the Holocaust, a subject that he told the judge he found boring. By asserting his relative ignorance of the subject, Irving increases the burden of proof on Lipstadt and her defence team.

But the Eichmann memoir – which is said to contain a meticulous record of the ghettoes and the cattle trains that took millions of Jews to the death camps of Eastern Europe – might change all that.



Adolf Eichmann

While the memoir has been kept under lock and key in Jerusalem for the past 40 years, it has been available to a handful of scholars. And Irving, crucially, is among the few who are believed to have acquired a detailed knowledge of the memoir.

In the past, Irving has claimed to have received two packages containing 426 pages of the document from a member of Eichmann's family while he was in Buenos Aires during a lecture tour of Argentina in 1991.

He has used parts of the Eichmann account, presumably confident that they would never be made public, to support his contention that there was no systematic genocide and that Hitler neither gave orders nor had knowledge of any mass killings of Jews.

In a 1997 letter to Robert Jan van Pelt, a Holocaust historian who testified for Lipstadt earlier in the trial, Irving also cited the Eichmann memoir to cast doubt on the existence of gas chambers. He claimed that while Eichmann described an "experimental" truck gassing, he was never shown a gas chamber at Auschwitz. Irving's presumption that the Eichmann memoir would remain securely locked away might prove to be the fatal flaw in his case.

"There was no denial of the Holocaust there," said Gavriel Bach, a junior prosecution counsel at the Eichmann trial in 1961 who went on to become an Israeli Supreme Court judge and was the first person to read the memoir.

"Eichmann tried to show that he was a minor cog in the machine and he had to obey orders, but he describes how terrible it was."

Said Bach: "He wanted his family to see it, and to see his role. Maybe he wanted to convince his family he did not take a central part in the Final Solution."

Now retired, Bach was Eichmann's main contact with the outside world while he was in jail.

At one point, after witnessing the liquidation of a group of Jews, Eichmann's memoirs, perhaps self-servingly, record his shock and his consumption of large quantities of alcohol as a tranquilizer to relieve his tension.

"In court," recalled Bach, "he admitted it was the most terrible crime in history. He says how he almost fainted when he saw the geysers of blood coming out of the bodies in the ditches."

Bach served on the panel of Israeli scholars and lawyers who decided that the memoir should be given immediately to aid Lipstadt's defence. A spokesperson for Israel's Justice Ministry said the panel agreed to give Lipstadt's lawyers a copy of the memoir as soon as possible "so she can defend herself in a lawsuit brought by a Holocaust denier."

And maybe, too, the final labours of the "Final Solution's" chief logician will also serve, unwittingly, to put to rest the contention that the Holocaust never happened.

Coloroso: kids need to think for themselves

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Parenting specialist Barbara Coloroso told an audience of 700 that parents need to let their children make mistakes so they can learn how to think for themselves.

Coloroso's recent talk was organized by the Toronto Heschel School as a fund-raiser. The evening, dedicated to Anne Tanenbaum, was sponsored by Aim Funds Management.

Parents need to let children make decisions and choices, said the Colorado-based educator, author and lecturer. "Let them [children] make mistakes when they're cheap."

She said parents should allow children "to experience the consequences of the choices they make, unless these choices are life threatening, unhealthy or morally threatening."

It is important for children to think for themselves so they can learn to be responsible adults; the responsibilities and decision-making opportunities should increase with age, she said, suggesting that this training begin early. "It's not life-threatening to let kids dress themselves."

Coloroso said that children who don't learn to think for themselves will be more likely to to follow their peers.

She said that strong-willed children often turn out to be easier in their adolescence because they're not easily led, and are less likely to follow their friends. Compliant children, however, may– in their teen years – seek the approval of their peers.

Children should decide on how to solve problems they have created, she said.

Coloroso emphasized the need for children to know they are cared for. "Everything we do reaffirms that they are worth it."

She said, "be present for what they need. Be open to what they need."

As for motivation, Coloroso said bribes and threats are the "flip side of the same coin." Children need to be internally motivated; "they need to hear 'thanks,' instead of [getting] rewards."

Parents should admit to making mistakes and fix the problem –" it's a way of modeling for their children," she said.

"If what you say is stupid, fix it. Don't follow through. If you want kids to talk to you, they have to be able to make mistakes."

Punishment or a consequence should "not be something that is done to someone."

A parent needs to help a child understand what he or she has done wrong, but "the child's dignity must still be intact," and parents should know the goal to be achieved by the punishment.

She stressed that a punishment should fit the crime, and should aim to achieve "reconciliation and restitution."

She said children "need the tools to develop inner discipline."

Scientists at conference discuss brain's frontal lobes

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The largest scientific conference ever held on the brain's frontal lobes will be hosted by the Rotman Research Institute of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Scientists from 28 countries will gather at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre March 20 to 24 for the conference.

"[It] is a wonderful recognition of the massive steps we've taken in our studies of the brain related to all forms of dementia, including those that are linked to strokes," said Dr. Donald Stuss, institute director and co-chair of the conference.

Dr. Donald Stuss

"Frontal lobe research is a hot topic today. The conference is a great kickoff for the new century."

The conference comes a a time when Baycrest is opening the doors on the spectacular new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and the Louis and Leah Posluns Centre for Stroke and Cognition.

One of the amazing things about frontal lobes is that they make up 25 to 33 percent of the human brain, are larger in humans than in other species, and do not reach their maximum functioning potential until age 32, although they begin to develop early in life, Stuss said.

For many years, the frontal lobes were considered by some to be relatively unimportant to brain functions, but recent research has turned that theory on its head, he added.

One such brain region is the right frontal lobe, often considered in the past not to play an important role. Yet today, Stuss said, studies of episodic memory (remembering past experiences) show what a vital role the right frontal lobe plays in the emotional memory of an event. In addition, the role of the right frontal lobe in appreciating humour is just now being recognized.

In the past 10 years, the Rotman Institute has made important advances in the field of dementia research, an area that is taking on increasing urgency as the population ages. At Baycrest, more than half the residents of the Jewish Home for the Aged have some form of cognitive impairment, most of which is related to Alzheimer's disease and vascular dementia due to stroke.

Although he is loath to list any single development as foremost, Stuss agreed that differentiating the diagnosis of Alzheimer's disease from other dementias is significant because it opens the door to specific treatments and rehabilitation.

Presenting at the five-day conference are scientists from the United States, Canada, Britain, Japan and Australia. Eight Rotman scientists are presenting on a wide range of frontal lobe research that looks at, among other things, the relationship between depression and cognitive impairment, and how older people use different parts of the brain than younger ones do, to recognize faces and words. Rotman scientists will also present research on how normal aging affects memory, and the role the frontal lobes play in Alzheimer's disease.

Sibs: Exploring Jewish family dynamics

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Why do brothers and sisters grow apart in later life?

This is the question two Jewish actors try to answer in Sibs running at Tarragon Theatre Extra Space March 14 to April 16.

In their play about a Jewish family, Diane Flacks plays an older sister to Richard Greenblatt, and though both have siblings in real life, they insist that Sibs is not autobiographical.

"But, it does have more Jewish content than any play I've written or performed in," said Flacks, who has appeared in many Toronto productions, including By a Thread and Gravity Calling.

Greenblatt, best known for 2 Pianos, 4 Hands, said he and Flacks have drawn on their experiences as Jews to try to shed light on the complex relationships between siblings.

They appeared together for the first time in the Tarragon play Theory of Relatives which dealt with the dynamics of Jewish family life at seders during Passover.

They both felt they had more to say about sibling relationships and, in fact, recurring seders take place in Sibs.

They both said that brothers and sisters get along well in their early "intimate" years, but grow apart in their tumultuous adolescent years and later on when, as in the play, there is squabbling over their parents' estate.

Flacks thinks that the varying attitudes of the different streams of Judaism as to whether women can play an equal role in saying kaddish for lost relatives, for example, is an important factor.

Greenblatt said that as the years go on "the loss of intimacy, innocence and trust" is what breaks up the bond between brothers and sisters.

There is no more invidious relationship between brothers and sisters, than between siblings of the same sex, they said, but both agreed in an interview with The CJN that the gender difference is important in the scheme of things.

The two actors are joined in Sibs by Rick Sacks who composed and performs the original music.

The play is directed by Alisa Palmer, with sets and costumes by Gleen Davidson and lighting by Andrea Lundy.

For information call the Tarragon box office, 416-531-1827.

Diane Flacks plays an older sister to Richard Greenblatt.

Writer finds muse in TO

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Anton Piatigorsky, 28, is a Jewish playwright whose muse is thriving in Toronto, his adopted city.

His latest play, The Offering, is the fourth to be performed here since he and his wife, Ava Roth of Montreal, moved here from the United States less than three years ago.

The play is based on three stories in Genesis about Isaac, and his sons Jacob and Esau.

"I'm curious about relationships between fathers and sons," he said. "My play has no particular message, but I examine the problems raised for them by the pressures society forces on them."

The cast of the play includes Gary Reineke, Mark Ellis and Dean Gilmour. James Cameron is the set and costume designer and Stephen Souter is stage manager.

Piatigorsky said that he finds collaboration with director Chris Abraham satisfying "because he has made me a better writer."

For the young playwright, a native of Bethesda, Md., Toronto was a pleasant surprise after stints in Providence, R. I., Jerusalem and New York.

Living in the Spadina-College area with his wife and six-month-old daughter, Sivan, Piatigorsky finds the city an exciting mix of diverse communities and cultures.

"I was happily surprised by the people I've met here, by their mix of hard work and intelligence without being pretentious," he told The CJN.

"Toronto is a booming theatre city not dominated by big commercial enterprises like London and New York."

Until he arrived in Toronto, Piatigorsky had one play produced, at his Alma Mater, Brown College in Providence, where he graduated in religious studies.

Since then, he has written and seen produced The Kabbalistic Psychoanalysis of Adam R. Tzaddik, Easy Lenny Lazman and Mysterium Tremendum. The first two have won various awards.

Moriah Productions, which the playwright founded, is presenting The Offering at Artword Theatre, 75 Portland St., March 19 to April 9, in association with Ashkenaz, a festival of new Yiddish culture.

A REAL-LIFE INDIANA JONES

Award-winning documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici of the Toronto-based production house Associated Producers is being billed as a "real-life Indiana Jones" in the promotional material leading up to the April airing of his documentary, Quest for the Lost Tribes, on the American Arts & Entertainment Network.

Ten of the 12 tribes of Ancient Israel disappeared some 2,700 years ago. Jacobovici, who wrote, produced and directed the A&E Special Presentation, takes viewers on "an unforgettable adventure to the most remote and exotic places on earth" in search of remnants of the legendary tribes.

Many myths arose in connection with the tribes. In medieval Europe, some speculated that the Mongolian invaders were the descendants of the 10 tribes, returning for blood. And in modern America, some Mormons still assert, despite the sound arguments of scholars, that Native Americans are also descendants of the lost tribes.

Quest was co-produced by Eliot Halpern and executive producers are Jack Rabinovitch and Robert Lantos. The show airs April 16 at 8 p.m. on A&E.

Israeli to speak on Holocaust fiction

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Aharon Appelfeld, one of Israel's leading writers, is slated to visit Toronto for 10 days this month as a newly installed writer and professor in residence at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

In a public lecture to be held on Sunday, March 19, at 1:45 p.m. at York's Curtis Lecture Hall I, Appelfeld will address the question: Is it possible to write fiction about the Holocaust? But those people familiar with his works will know that the question is rhetorical.

Born in Bukovina in 1933, Appelfeld escaped from a Nazi concentration camp and survived as a child refugee, wandering through the forests of eastern Europe. Although he learned Hebrew only after the war, it is in that language that he has penned some 30 books. About a dozen have been translated into English.

His novels include To the Land of the Cattails and his most recent, The Conversion. In many of the books, he draws on his own experiences to evoke the lost world of prewar Europe and the growing sense of impending doom.

"His books deal with the periphery of the Holocaust," notes Prof. Michael Brown, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies. "He doesn't write directly about the camps or the horrors of the Holocaust, but about things on the periphery – either geographically or in terms of time.

"He's giving voice to the Holocaust and the people involved in it, but always from the edges."

Appelfeld's March 19 address, will be directly followed by a symposium at 3:30 p.m in the same venue. Titled, My First Encounter with Aharon Appelfeld, the symposium will feature Jonathan Rosen, Chava Rosenfarb and Dr. Vivian Rakoff.

Appelfeld is slated to participate in an evening for child survivors on March 11, 8 p.m., Vanier College Faculty Common Room; and to deliver two lectures in Hebrew – The Rise and Fall of the Hebrew Writer on March 13, 8 p.m., Vanier College Study Hall; and My Life and Works on March 14, 2 p.m., Vanier College, Room 188.

He is also scheduled to lecture to students, and participate in several private events, including a reception for contributors to Parchment, the journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing. All events are free.

Appelfeld will be inaugurating the Silber Family Chair for Holocaust & Eastern European Jewish Studies. According to Brown, his visit marks the first time the 11-year-old centre has brought in a distinguished visitor for an extended period of time.

Appelfeld's autobiography, Story Of A Life, recently published in Hebrew, was complemented by a companion volume, All Whom I Loved, which he describes as a "sort of autobiography." Both are due to appear in English translation this year.

For information, call the Centre for Jewish Studies at 416-736-5823.

Haza had AIDS, doctors say

By RAN REZNICK
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Singer Ofra Haza died from complications resulting from AIDS, say doctors who treated her.

Haza died at the Sheba Hospital on Feb. 23.

A senior doctor at the hospital claims that neither Haza nor certain members of her family informed the medical staff that she was infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

Only on the day after her admission to the hospital did the results of blood work confirm that Haza was indeed infected with HIV.

Senior officials at the Health Ministry and at Sheba state that some of the medical and nursing teams who treated Haza, as well as lab workers, are furious that they were not told of Haza's infection.

Officials say the staff members believe they were put at risk, because they did not take the precautionary steps necessary when dealing with AIDS patients.

Keep a low profile when travelling to Russia, Ukraine, book warns

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Most Jews in Canada can trace their ancestry back to what was once the Pale of Settlement, encompassing Russia and Ukraine.

These countries are easier to visit since the fall of communism, and in A Travel Guide to Jewish Russia & Ukraine (Pelican Publishing Company), Ben Frank takes you there.

He explores the rebirth of Jewish life, visits sites of historical interest, advises you where to eat, and lists the addresses of synagogues, clubs and Jewish community institutions.

The book, 400 pages in length, covers Moscow and St. Petersburg in Russia, and Kiev, Zhitomir, Berdichev, Kharkov, Lvov and Odessa in Ukraine.

For good measure, Frank – a travel consultant – adds a chapter on Moldova.

He has sage advice for first-time travellers to this part of the world. Always travel with a companion. Keep a low profile. Do not leave baggage unattended. Drink only bottled water.

He is right. When I travelled through Russia and Ukraine on two separate trips in the early 1990s, I followed these rules scrupulously and emerged unscathed.

I only wish he had not included a surfeit of photographs of himself and his wife in this otherwise useful book. It appears that the cult of the personality, a feature of the Communist era, has rubbed off on him.

Purim spiel

TORONTO — Ashkenaz Foundation, The Bloor JCC and the Downtown Jewish Community Council presents an original Purim spiel written by acclaimed film writer and director Annie Szamosi and directed by Dora-award winning Anne Barber and Elisa Kukla on March 19 at noon and 1 p.m. at the Bloor JCC.

Musician Dave Wall and clown Niki Berkowitz portray an outrageous cast of characters and the Shadowland Theatre's puppets enliven the spiel. Catch the carnival before and after the shows.

New York's lower east side a great place to get a sandwich

By NEILIA SHERMAN
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — At Ratner's dairy restaurant in New York's Lower East Side, the waiters are very particular about how you give an order. I made the mistake of asking for a tuna sandwich.

Do you mean chopped tuna or a can of tuna asked Walter, my waiter, in a slightly irritated tone. I look at my lunch companions confused. My host, Andrew Flamm, director of the Lower East Side Business Improvement District, explains that chopped tuna is the same as chopped egg but tuna in the can is literally that, a whole can of tuna brought to the table with mayonnaise so that patrons can prepare the tuna exactly to their liking.

Tenements in the Lower East Side as it is today.

I decide that since this restaurant has been in existence for 95 years they must know how to make a good tuna salad so I order the chopped.

As we wait for our food, Robert Harmadz, the present owner explains that his grandfather founded Ratners in 1905 and three generations later it is the oldest family run restaurant in New York City. It still is a kosher dairy restaurant and is supervised by Kof-K kosher supervision services.

The place hasn't changed much in 95 years and is still popular with the older Jewish population who make Sundays the traditional day to come with the family for lunch.

In order to appeal to the younger generation, Harmadz is looking at making some upscale items available. A lounge area in the back will be expanded and will include a gourmet menu and nightly musical entertainment.

Andrew has generously offered to give us a tour of the area and introduce us to some of the business owners.

I ask him about the changes in the ethnic make up of the Lower East Side. The latest immigrants to settle here are Asian and Latin American. "It's an incredible mix of the old world and the new world," he says, "some of the businesses have been here for over 100 years. Others are obviously new and trendy."

The first settlers in this area, mainly from northern Europe, arrived in 1850 but, by far, the largest group of immigrants to inhabit the Lower East Side were the enormous numbers of Eastern European Jews who arrived in America via Ellis Island and ended up living in the tenement buildings constructed to house them.

Our next stop is the Essex Street Market. Located indoors, it is filled with vendors selling fresh meats, produce and specialty items. This market was established 50 years ago by Mayor La Guardia in order to remove the pedlars from the crowded streets. Since the majority of the merchants were Jewish, for generations, the Lower East Side was the only shopping district to be open on Sundays.

Although many changes have taken place, as waves of new immigrants have moved into the area and set up shops and restaurants that reflect their own ethnic backgrounds, there is still a strong Jewish presence in this area.

Many of the vendors have their wares hanging outside their stores, giving the area an open market feel. As we cross Delancey I can't help but think of the movie, Crossing Delancey, about a lonely Jewish girl who finds her true love with the "pickle man."

We move on to the Orchard Corset Discount Center where we meet Mrs. Bergstein and her son. They are Orthodox Jews, who are still running this family owned business that was established 37 years ago. This tiny store specializes in hard to find sizes for ladies brassieres and lingerie. I am stunned when Mrs. Bergstein, proud of her wares, goes to find me a size I bra to show me what she means.

Down the street is Schapiro's Premium Kosher Wines. Founded in 1899 this is the only remaining operational kosher winery in New York City. The company's original motto was "so thick you can cut it with a knife."

The wines are still made the old fashioned way that takes over six months. Although they are holding onto such traditions and the business has remained in the same building at 126 Rivington St., where they've been since 1908, there have also been innovations.

They are now making Kosher wines with a broader appeal. There are 32 varieties including three table wines and soon they will offer a kosher California Chardonnay and a kosher Champagne.

Tours are given hourly on Sundays with free wine tasting. Rabbi Yaakov Yitzchak Speigal, the rabbi of the First Roumanian-American Congregation, which has been in existence for 135 years in the Lower East side, certifies that all of the Schapiro's wines are Mevushal and Kosher for Passover.

A visit to the Lower East Side Tenement Museum is a must in order to get a sense of what life was like for turn-of-the-century immigrants. Through a combination of tours, art exhibits and life theatre, this museum provides a historical perspective on a variety of immigrant experiences.

A popular tour designed for families involves a Living History Program which focuses on 1916 and the Sephardi Jewish Confino family. Visitors are treated as if they are newly arrived immigrants.

Free tours of the Historic Orchard Street Shopping District take place every Sunday at 11 a.m. (April through December). Meet at the corner of Ludlow and East Houston Streets.

Andrew Flamm is available for personalized or group tours through the Visitors Centre at 261 Broome St. and he can be reached, toll free at 1-888-VALUES-4 or directly at (212) 226-9010.

Israeli skaters ready to drop the puck in Bulgaria

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — International hockey's tournament season is about to begin, and two Israeli teams are gearing up for a medal run. Unlike past seasons when the boys in blue were also-rans, this year's teams should have a legitimate shot at a medal, perhaps even gold.

Israel's under-18 junior national hockey team flew to Sofia, Bulgaria, for the European Championships earlier this week while the senior nats will head to Iceland in April for the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Pool D event.

Last year's performances by both teams showed that hockey in Israel has made tremendous strides over the years. The senior team was robbed of a gold medal when the referee failed to see the winning goal enter and quickly exit the net, depriving them of the right to advance to the C Pool from the IIHF's D Division. The juniors were hampered by weak goaltending in the medal round, finishing fourth in the tournament.

This year, the juniors are matched with teams from Iceland, Yugoslavia, Luxembourg, Croatia, Bulgaria, South Africa, the Netherlands and Belgium. The seniors will face off versus teams from Iceland, Turkey, Belgium, Mexico, South Africa, New Zealand, Luxembourg and Australia.

Four Canadian "ringers" and one from the United States will round out the under-18 team. Daniel Bochner of Toronto, Itzik Levy, Joey Zukran and David Finkelstein of Montreal, along with Asher Moyal of New York City, will solidify the juniors' Israel-based nucleus. Team manager Jeff Budd of Kitchener, Ont., who worked for several years at the Canada Centre rink in Metulla, will accompany the youngsters to Bulgaria.

Budd said this year's crop of juniors should be a little better than last year's team. "It's pretty much the same team as last year, but everyone is one year older."

Israel's senior nationals won a silver medal last year.

The Israelis will feature the Naminov brothers, Matan and Shalev. Matan has attended Roger Neilson's hockey camp in Lindsay, Ont., Budd said, as have other members of the team.

The Israelis will be coached by Simeon Yakubovich and Boris Mindel, who learned their craft in the former Soviet Union.

It's hard to say whether the team can improve on last year's fourth place finish, Budd said. Almost every year is a transition phase for most countries as older players become ineligible and are replaced by a younger group. Israel will face off against Yugoslavia and Iceland in a round robin and depending on their performance, they will either advance to the medal round or to consolation play.

Israel's hockey program has made great strides in recent years, thanks in large part to the Olympic rink in Metulla, home to a hockey school run by Roger Neilson. In 1990, there were 150 registered players in the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel. Today, there are nearly 500.

But major problems hamper the sport's development, particularly the absence of ice rinks in the country's heartland. The Metulla rink is about 190 kilometres from the centre of the country. The municipality of Jerusalem has provided land for a new rink, but money to build and maintain a new facility is not yet available.

The sport is chronically under-funded, according to a news release issued by the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel. The federation is staffed entirely by volunteers. The national teams have inadequate access to rinks for practices. At tournament time, the national teams lack the money to pay for a few crucial days of practice together in the host country. Hockey equipment is expensive and rarely available for purchase in Israel. While the federation readily accepts quality second-hand equipment, there is no regular flow of needed items into the country.

Sergei Matin and Sergei Belo, president and vice-president (and captain of the senior national team) respectively of the hockey federation, believe North American Jews who love hockey could be the sport's benefactors. They believe a well-funded program of youth hockey boosts the morale and assists in the healthy development of a generation of immigrants still at odds with the new culture in which they find themselves.

Anyone wishing to become involved in supporting hockey in Israel can contact Budd at 416-256-5628.

Inside Back

The violin that softened

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Holocaust memoirs always read more vividly when one knows the author. That's why I found Violin of Stone, penned by Toronto sculptor and (if I may drop a name) my friend Ernest Raab, to be a moving and colourful recollection, partly because it reflects the voice and heart of a true artist.

More accurately, Ernie is an artiste, usually clad in black, rarely without a broad-brimmed hat, one side pulled rakishly over a brow. He speaks with drama and intensity, and waves his hands liberally. Violin of Stone, with an initial print run of 1,000 copies by Lugus Publications of Toronto, reads the way Ernie sounds: fast, impetuous, and like his art, passionate.

For those who don't know Ernie Raab, he's responsible for a host of great Jewish art in this city, most notably, the Yad Vashem Holocaust monument in Earl Bales Park, a towering, flame-topped bronze obelisk that takes one's breath away. Nearby sits another Raab creation, a bronze bust, surrounded by symbolic prison bars, of Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish war-era diplomat who rescued more Jews from the Nazi war machine than any single government, and who disappeared into Soviet custody in 1945. Raab also created the wonderful stained glass at Beth David Synagogue, and a 24-foot-high steel and bronze work at the new Village Shul.

Not bad for someone who has spent the better part of his life quarrelling with God.

Born into a large family of mitnagdim (opponents of Chassidism) in the town of Komarom, which straddled the Hungarian/Czech border, young Moshe-Yehudah was the only member of his clan to study at a yeshiva.

His story is as harrowing as they come, a nightmare of work camps, escape and constant fear. While a slave labourer, Raab, not yet 18, survived on a kilo of bread per week. It was then that he insists he was in telepathic contact with his parents, who had been deported to a death mill. One night, he writes, "I woke with a start, thinking of both my mother and father. I was surprised by my sense of emptiness, of no longer feeling the dreadful pain of their suffering. My heart had become like a dark cavern, cold and empty. I wept silently. I let my tears flow as never before, for I had suddenly understood that my parents were no longer of this world and that from then on, I would be alone on earth."

He looked up at the stars and cried, "Speak no more to me. I am a violin of stone, a tombstone of granite."

What makes these memoirs refreshingly different is that Raab's suffering takes a back seat to the spiritual crisis the suffering triggered. Running as a red thread throughout is the age-old question of where was God at Auschwitz – a question the author has no qualms asking, given that he lost more than 150 members of his immediate family.

That inner struggle, that bottled-up rage and torment, found an outlet in postwar Paris, where Raab embarked on his long and fruitful artistic career.

It was also after the war that Raab forsook God completely, renouncing even the recitation of Kaddish for his parents. It was a period that lasted 20 years.

Maybe it was the many synagogue commissions in Canada, beginning with the 1954 re-design of the eastern wall at Beth Tzedec Congregation, that helped Raab ease back into a relationship with God, such as it is. But if his memoirs are any indication, perhaps Ernie never totally lost his faith because he sees the world through the eyes of an artist, a world steeped in kabbalistic meaning, where every tree and stream has meaning. Now 73, the author confesses his book was completed "with God's help, blessed be He."

That doesn't mean Ernie and God don't still have the occasional set-to. "It will go on until my last minute," he told me last week. "And He will be the victor."

About Seniors

Dr. Mark says...

By DR. MARK CLARFIELD

Patients need a doctor who can translate from that arcane, yet necessary tongue so laboriously acquired after many years of training: Medicalese.

They need a physician who will not, under any circumstances, utter the following: "The diagnosis, Mr. Smith, is clear. You are suffering from intermittent claudication, in which an obstruction to normal tissue circulation is caused by a buildup of atheromatous plaque resulting in significant inschemia."

In addition to the barriers caused by the fact that doctor and patient have a different vocabulary, in the case of older patients, reduced vision and/or hearing may limit communication. Furthermore, English, particularly in the Canadian Jewish community, may well not be the mother tongue of many.

I recall when I was an intern at Baycrest Hospital I was struggling in vain to make myself understood in fractured Yiddish to a very unilingual patient. After listening to me babbling incoherently, the lady in the next bed, who had been diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease, informed me in English that my Yiddish was terrible. I asked her if she would translate for me, and she did quite a good job.

Not only do older patients require that their physician speak to them in plain English, but they must also be spoken to with respect. For example, unless patients direct me otherwise, I never call them by their first names.

I teach the medical students that when they approach the bedside, they should always sit on the patient's bed (making sure not to squash a leg). I sit beside the patient for several reasons. First, I am usually tired halfway through my rounds. Second, I physically bring myself down to the patient's eye level. Third, sitting while talking transmits the non-verbal message that you have all the time in the world. Even if you have just 30 seconds, sit.

Purim Morning Megillah by Elie Benzaquen

Pour the story into their souls

Editorial

Purim is a splendid gift to the Jewish people, offering us numerous inter-related prescriptions for human survival. We can arrange them, like the pieces of a Russian doll, one at a time or snugly together. Purim teaches us the importance of resolve and action in the face of grave danger. It reminds us of the strength that derives from unity. But, most importantly, it provides us with the occasion to see the happy radiance in the eyes of our children as they revel in the story, unaware of its true gravity. With costumes, noisemakers and special snacks, generations of Jews have poured the story of Purim into the souls of our children. And our children, in turn, lift our hearts, and carry us to an insight or a reminiscence and we remember to say: Thank you for having brought us to this day.

Chrétien set to visit Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Jean Chrétien is about to become the first Canadian prime minister to visit Israel in an official capacity.

Chrétien will visit the Jewish state April 8 to 10 as part of a 10-day, five-nation Middle East tour which includes, Gaza, Egypt, Lebanon, Jordan and Syria.

His itinerary was still sketchy as The CJN went to press, but officials at the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv said he will most likely meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, and with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

He will visit Yad Vashem and pay respects at the grave of Yitzhak Rabin, embassy officials added. (Chrétien attended Rabin's funeral in 1995, but that was not a state visit.)

On April 10 at the Mount Scopus campus of Hebrew University, Chrétien will receive an honorary doctorate, to be presented by Hebrew U. president Menachem Magidor.

There's a long-standing relationship between Canada and Hebrew University. The school's Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies is the largest such facility outside Canada.

It was rumoured Chrétien would go to the Canada Centre, a sports facility in the northern town of Metulla, and visit with Canadian peacekeeping forces on the Golan Heights, but the Prime Minister's Office in Ottawa could not confirm that.

He will, however, hold talks with the leaders of Egypt, Syria and Jordan. Canada's position in the Middle East changed abruptly in 1992, when it agreed to chair the round of multilateral peace talks on the sensitive issue of Palestinian refugees.

Accompanying Chrétien will be several members of Parliament, including Montreal Liberal Irwin Cotler, and possibly, Senator Sheila Finestone.

Also going will be Joe Wilder, president of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Appeal Dismissed

TORONTO — The Federal Court of Appeal has dismissed the case of Michael Taylor, the Muslim imam barred from a 1993 trial for wearing a kufi (religious head covering). Taylor's appeal sought to determine the jurisdiction of the Canadian Human Rights Commission in this case. The CHRC had refused to hear the case. Canadian Jewish Congress served as an intervener in the appeal.

Todres Leaving Post

TORONTO — Elaine Todres has resigned after three years as president of the Baycrest Centre Foundation, to establish her own company. Her resignation is effective March 31. Previously, she was Ontario's deputy solicitor general and deputy minister of correctional services.

Jewish Poor

OTTAWA — More than 1,500 individuals, or 12.5 percent of the Jewish population of Ottawa-Hull, live below the poverty line, according to a new study. Most Jewish poor fall into two age groups, 10 to 14, and 25 to 39, suggesting that low-income families are relatively young. The study also shows that 30 percent of Jewish poor have completed at least an undergraduate university degree.

Studying Canada

VANCOUVER — Two top Israeli government advisors were in Vancouver recently to study Canadian multiculturalism. Earlier, they had been to Ottawa, where they met with federal officials and members of cultural groups. The officials said Canada can serve as a model in the development of an Israeli policy on its minorities.

ISRAEL

Most Welcome Pope

JERUSALEM — Most Israelis are looking forward to welcoming Pope John Paul II when he begins his historic pilgrimage later this month. According to a recent Gallup poll, 59 percent of Israeli Jews view the Pope's visit "positively" or "very positively." Haredi Israelis had the most negative outlook on the visit, with only eight percent saying they approve.

Murderer Released

JERUSALEM — A Jewish settler sentenced to life in prison for the execution-style murder of a Palestinian man was granted an early release after serving seven years. In 1993, Yoram Shkolnik, 31, shot a bound and blindfolded Palestinian terrorist who had stabbed another settler. The parole board said Shkolnik had expressed remorse. His release is expected in April.

WORLD

Haider on Holocaust

VIENNA — Controversial far-right politician Joerg Haider says Austria should apologize for the Holocaust. "I think so," he said in a published interview, "above all, for the younger generation, which should reflect on that part of history and remember what happened."

Leader Dies

KINGSTON, Jamaica — Ernest de Souza, the longtime spiritual leader of Jamaica's 500-year-old Jewish community, died this month of a heart attack. He was 67. A professional photographer, he had filled the post of rabbi since the last ordained rabbi left Jamaica in 1978. "Reverend" de Souza, as islanders called him, published several books, including a pictorial history of Jamaican Jewry.

Nazis Down Under

SYDNEY — Scores of Holocaust-era war criminals are living in Australia, and there is little hope that they will ever be brought to justice, according to the U.S. government's top Nazi hunter, Eli Rosenbaum. On a visit here, Rosenbaum added that both Australia and the United States unwittingly allowed war criminals to enter their countries at the end of World War II.

'Soap' Incident

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine Jewish leaders are calling on authorities to prosecute soccer fans who chanted Nazi slogans and hurled soap bars at a Jewish team. The recent incident came just before a new report on anti-Semitism was delivered to President Fernando de la Rua.

Mordechai Takes Leave Pending Probe

JERUSALEM — Israel's transport minister last week announced he is taking a leave of absence while police investigate allegations he sexually harassed a 23-year-old female employee in his office.

"These things never happened," Yitzhak Mordechai said in a statement, adding he is taking the leave so police can conduct an "effective investigation to reach the truth."

The Israeli daily Yediot Achronot broke the story Tuesday, when the Knesset held a special session to mark International Women's Day.

The newspaper report, which did not name the minister, said the alleged harassment began several months ago.

Within hours, several Israeli Internet sites were naming Mordechai.

The employee claimed that several instances of sexual harassment took place in Mordechai's office.

The announcement of the police probe prompted several other women to come forward with similar claims.

Mordechai served as defence minister in the former Likud government of Benjamin Netanyahu.

Apotex Centre opens at Baycrest

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sunshine pouring in from a spectacular, seven-storey atrium flooded the scene at the official opening of the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged and the Louis and Leah Posluns Centre for Stroke and Cognition.

The $60 million building, which is part of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, will house 472 residents. They will move into the new home in May.

"It's awesome, it's so beautiful," said Ontario Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing Tony Clement during the ribbon-cutting ceremony. Clement had earlier toured the building with Baycrest president Stephen Herbert.

Residents, who will occupy six floors of the new home, will live in single rooms with en suites, in groups or "houses" of 13 to 14 residents. Each house has its own dining room and there are many visual aids to help the residents find their way around.

All of the six residential floors have recreation rooms, outdoor balconies, a children's play area and a laundromat.

The Ontario government's contribution of $19.8 million was vital to construction of the new home, said Baycrest centre chair Marvin Sadowski. "The new home is our way of honouring and respecting our elders."

An unprecedented fund-raising campaign brought the centre to completion, he said.

The Golan dilemma

From the editor's desk

The bus left our Jerusalem hotel early in the morning heading eastward toward the sun which had not yet risen totally above the craggy beige hills in the horizon.

Some 130 journalists from all over the world, who were in Jerusalem to attend the Eighth International Conference of the Jewish Media, travelling in three buses, were on their way for a one-day "field trip" to the Golan Heights.

The eastward portion of the journey lasted only a few minutes after which we began a relatively slow and cautious descent of the Judean hills northward in the direction of Jericho, one of the oldest cities on earth and the lowest, some 250 metres below sea level.

On this day, however, the lowest city in the region would be only a signpost along the way towards the highest of "cities" in the region, more than two hours away by bus, in the north, on the volcanic basin known as the Golan Heights.

The Heights were captured from Syria 33 years ago in the Six Day War and were the battlefields of the fiercest, bloodiest fighting of the Yom Kippur War 27 years ago. They are the protective topographical canopy for the Kineret (the Sea of Galilee) and for the entire upper Galilee panhandle of the Hula Valley and contain within their geography three of the four sources of the Jordan River.

Mount Hermon, the snow-capped peak of the Golan, that stands 2,224 metres above sea level, is the listening post of the IDF. From its bunkered lookout, the IDF can literally monitor the traffic in downtown Damascus.

The Heights are also, now, the place where some 18,000 Israelis in 33 different communities live comfortable, serene, fulfilling lives.

The area today for the people who live there, not just the Israelis but the nearly 17,000 Druze as well, is a veritable "oasis" of social tranquility and economic boom in a region not generally known for socially tranquil moments or booms other than the explosive kind.

The air is cleaner; the pace is slower; the living quarters less cramped.

The economy of the area is supported by fantastically successful agricultural, industrial and tourism sectors. The Golan farms supply more than 50 percent of the Israeli market in cherries, 40 percent of cattle and 30 percent of apples, to name just a few items. The Golan wineries are considered by some to be the best in Israel. And the Golan guest houses and other tourist-related businesses, of which there are some 207, are among the busiest in the country.

But as everyone knows, the future of the Golan as a place where Israelis will continue to live is very much in doubt. For, if a peace treaty is to be secured with Syria, the price will likely be the total dismantling of this oasis.

The mere thought of it brings a shudder to most Israelis' hearts, and yet, as the most recent poll from the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University suggests, more than 60 percent of the Jewish public in Israel would support doing so "in return for full peace with Syria and appropriate security arrangements which would enable the IDF to pull out of Lebanon."

Herein lies the existential dilemma for Israelis. They agonize over the question. They ask themselves can full peace with Syria ever be achieved, as long as it is a despotic tyranny? (Indeed, the question is raised by many Israelis in respect of the Palestinians as well. But the well-documented cruelty of the Syrian ruler and the severely oppressive nature of his regime over the years have generated greater skepticism of his trustworthiness among Israelis.)

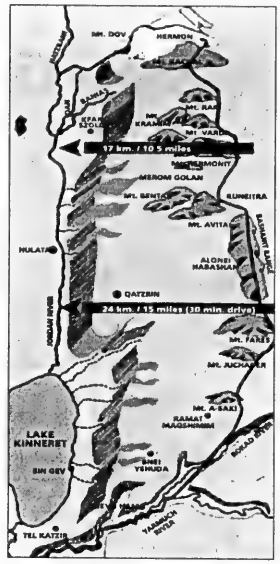
For the 18,000 Jewish residents of the Golan however, the agony reaches far deeper. It is their homes and their communities and their lives that will be uprooted if that treaty is ever signed.

We, the Diaspora journalists touring in our buses, witnessed an expression of the deep inner conflict among Golan residents, at a stop in Katzrin, the modern "capital" of the Golan built upon the site of the ancient Jewish city.

Four residents, two on either side of the question, debated the advisability of evacuation from their homes. The debate was civil though very emotional.

Those opposed to evacuation spoke emphatically. They too were in favour of pursuing a peace treaty with Syria. They simply could not accept, however, that peace must necessarily entail their departure from the area. The fact that Assad demands their total withdrawal convinces them that any peace treaty would not be a true and full peace.

Those in favour of evacuation spoke less assuredly but with equal conviction. "It is a mistake to say Syrian sovereignty on the Golan is a danger to Israel. The next fight will be with missiles. The main factor for security for Israel is a stable peace. I'm not certain we can make peace, but we have to see if they will sign an agreement... The balance is outweighed in favour of peace... My home is not more important than the State of Israel."



The Golan Heights

Listening to the heart-rending outpourings from the four residents left me emotionally drained but also marvelling at the strength of the people who live in Israel who seem destined to be forever facing existential dilemmas.

Only the passage of time will tell whether evacuation is right or wrong. For us it remains to try to understand their dilemmas and to support the democratic process that brings them to their fateful decisions.

Israel not close to peace with Syria: Sharansky

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Natan Sharansky doubts whether Israel and Syria will sign a peace treaty any time soon.

He told an informal press conference here last week that he considers the latest Syrian demand for renewing bilateral negotiations "problematic." The talks were broken off in January after two sessions in the United States.

Israel, he elaborated, should not give Syria a written guarantee pledging to withdraw to the June 4, 1967 lines and thus enable the Syrians to regain the northeastern corner of the Sea of Galilee.

"I'm personally skeptical that Israel will reach an agreement with Syria on such a basis," said Sharansky, the minister of interior in Prime Minister Ehud Barak's coalition government.

Sharansky, a former dissident who spent eight years in a Soviet prison until his release in 1986, said he supports an accord with Syria in principle.

But, he strongly believes, an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan should be phased over a period of up to two decades so as to build mutual trust. "It has to be a process over years."

Israel would be compromising its security by relinquishing the Golan too hastily, said Sharansky, who was here under the auspices of State of Israel Bonds, and who attended a luncheon hosted by the Royal Bank of Canada.

"Syria can't offer Israel a real peace treaty immediately."

Describing Syria as a "remnant of a totalitarian regime," he suggested that Israeli territorial concessions to Damascus should be linked to Syria's willingness to open and democratize its society.

Sharansky, leader of the Yisrael B'Aliya party, warned he would bolt the coalition if Barak agrees to Syrian conditions for renewing talks.

"If there is an agreement against Israel's security (interests), we'll have to fight it," explained Sharansky, whose party has four seats in the Knesset. "It'll be impossible to stay in the government."

Sharansky said he endorsed a unanimous cabinet decision on March 5 to withdraw Israeli troops from Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon, unilaterally if necessary, because it serves Israel's interests.

"I believe we can leave and change the rules of the game so that Hezbollah and Syria won't test us."

Should Hezbollah attack northern Israel after a pullout from Lebanon, Israel, he said, should respond harshly.

Turning to the Palestinian track in the peace process, Sharansky expressed optimism that a final status deal can be attained by Sept. 13 – Barak's self-imposed deadline – despite the very difficult issues on the table.

"We should give the Palestinians all rights except to destroy us. There is a basis for negotiations, but the principle of reciprocity should be kept."

Talks should be conducted on the understanding that Israel will not control the lives of Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip after a final status agreement.

Sharansky voiced concern about the Palestinian demand for at least 90 percent of the West Bank before the interim period ends. He said that Barak is working on this problem.

Asked to comment on Yasser Arafat's promise to declare unilateral statehood next September, Sharansky said, "The language of threats from the Palestinians won't pay. It is not in the Palestinian interest to act one-sidedly."

Deflecting a question about his view of Palestinian statehood, Sharansky noted that this issue is best left for the last stage of negotiations. "We should not try to predict results at the beginning."

Sharansky urged Palestinian authorities to eliminate anti-Israel incitement in the curriculum of their public schools.

As for Jerusalem, he said it should remain undivided under Israel's rule. "We can't discuss the division of Jerusalem." Palestinian residents, however, should be given full religious and cultural rights.

Israel has a historical right to build new settlements in the territories, but should refrain from doing so to enhance the chances of achieving a peace treaty with the Palestinians.

The settlement policy, he acknowledged, has been used by opponents to undermine the peace process.

Asked whether the Palestinian Authority has co-operated with Israel in the campaign to stamp out terrorism, Sharansky observed: "At some points, the Palestinians have shown good faith in security co-operation. But even in the best of moments, they co-operate only in a technical way. It's not strategic cooperation."

Apotex Centre officially launched at Baycrest

"This is a new century and I see this opening as a sign that we have things right," said Clement. "This is the hope of the future."

The minister, who is of Greek descent, said he felt right at home amidst the olive trees in the lobby, which formed a canopy over him during his address.

Besides the 29-foot black olive trees from Florida, the centre has a 335-gallon living reef marine aquarium, a seven-foot high bird cage for a pair of talking parrots, a water pond and café.

The atrium floor is tiled with imported Jerusalem stone.

Interviews with residents and their families indicated that they wanted privacy, meaningful activity, an increase in choices and an opportunity to develop relationships, Herbert said. Baycrest sought ideas for the new centre from all over the world, he added.

Increase in choices

A Baycrest press release said the largest group in the new home have Alzheimer's disease. Some floors will house residents who are physically frail, but cognitively intact, and there will be a floor for residents with dementia resulting from stroke.

Residents suffer from a variety of chronic conditions. For example, there is a large group with movement disorders such as Parkinson's disease. There are also residents in need of mental health support.

Taking part in the ceremonies were Apotex Inc. chair and CEO Barry Sherman, Wilfred Posluns, and Sandy Rosenberg, daughter of resident Luba Szarfer, who was also present.

A plaque on behalf of Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman was presented to Sadowski by deputy Mayor Casey Ootes. In the past 25 years, the number of seniors in Toronto has doubled to 13 percent of the total population, Ootes noted.

MACCABIAH BRIDGE DISASTER VICTIMS SEEK SUPPORT OF CANADIAN JEWS

The victims most affected by the Maccabiah Bridge Disaster wish to let the Canadian Jewish Community know of our ongoing dispute with Maccabi World Union (MWU) concerning its unsatisfactory response to the aftermath of the Maccabiah Bridge Disaster. We are taking the unusual step of presenting to you our version of events to counter-balance the MWU Special Report concerning the Disaster which we understand Maccabi Canada is distributing in Canada on behalf of MWU

BACKGROUND:

MWU invited to Israel participants to the 15th Maccabiah

MWU requisitioned a pedestrian bridge so that athletes could cross the Yarkon River to enter the Opening Ceremony at the Ramat Gan Stadium. On 14 July 1997, whilst the Australian delegation was crossing the bridge, it collapsed causing the death of four Australian Jews and injuring over seventy other Jewish athletes, some of them, including Sasha Elterman, very seriously. Whilst this occurred, the Opening Ceremony continued

We want to make it clear that we take no issue with MWU concerning what they did or may have done for us and some of our families up to the time we left Israel. We were engaged in comforting those who lost dear ones and survival during this time.

The issue we do take with MWU is its insensitive attitude in the aftermath of the Disaster as well as its failure to take any form of responsibility whether legal or otherwise and account for this terrible tragedy which has changed our lives forever.

The Australian Jewish Community has campaigned with us for:

- the standing aside of MWU President Ronald Bakalarz and MWU Chairman Uzi Netanel from their MWU positions until at least the resolution of all legal proceedings and the conclusion of the Knesset inquiry into MWU's role in the Disaster
- the fulfilment by MWU of promised loan funds (recently fulfilled)
- a revamp of MWU particularly in respect of safety standards
- the payment of just compensation

Loan Funds:

In September 1997, both the State of Israel and MWU pledged to the victims, through Maccabi Australia, loan funds. The State honoured its pledge within a reasonable time. MWU did not. There were gross delays, coupled with MWU requiring us to sign a loan document effectively releasing MWU and its insurer from liability beyond the scope of its insurance policy. These actions further inflamed relations with MWU. MWU blamed its insurer and lawyers, following outcries from Australia.

Resignations:

We make this call, not because we pre-judge the MWU leaders in any way. They have never been required to admit legal liability. We have always made this clear notwithstanding MWU pronouncements to the contrary. The reason we require these leaders to stand aside is

- to take proper responsibility for what occurred at an MWU event,
- because the current leadership of MWU is incapable of acknowledging its own failures
- and because of its attitude of denial, self-justification and blame shifting.

This has nothing to do with any legal proceedings, criminal and civil.

MWU says that the resignations of Yoram Eyal and Ittamar Herman from the defunct 15th Maccabiah Organising Committee and from other MWU positions constituted "moral responsibility". They were not MWU leaders and in any event these "resignations" were neither sought by us nor the Australian Jewish Community whose consistent demands have been ignored by MWU.

What is now clear to us is that MWU

- wanted nothing to do with the Disaster once we were evacuated from Israel
- have to this day not apologised to us personally for its part in the tragedy
- have to this day not accepted proper moral responsibility for the Disaster
- failed to embrace us and the Australian Jewish Community's requirements for a resolution
- shifts blame to others for any failure
- engaged in excessive delay in delivery to the victims of pledged loan funds
- failed to account for its role in the Disaster
- misrepresented the findings of the Dotan Commission

- UZI NETANEL following the release of the Israel appointed Dotan Commission Report said: "The report showed that we had no hand whatsoever in this failure ... as an organised body Maccabi would be ready in the event of lawsuits." [Jerusalem Post 24 July 1997].

This despite the fact that the Dotan Commission found: "A chain of negligence, from faulty planning through incompetent building was blamed yesterday on all parties involved in the collapse of the Maccabiah footbridge on 14 July 1997." ..."Faulty, planning, negligence, incompetence, inferior materials, lack of coordination between construction companies and organising bodies ..." [Jerusalem Post 24 July 1997.]

- RONALD BAKALARZ at a press conference in response to the findings made by the Dotan Commission: "I had no doubt that there was no responsibility by the organising committee because I was party to the whole process and the contracting of the bridge. I had no doubt that they acted seriously and took the right decisions. I saw absolutely no fault in their work. The report has come to the same conclusions". [Jerusalem Post 24 July 1997]

- RONALD BAKALARZ at the Closing Ceremony of the 15th Maccabiah was reported as follows: "Taking a more defiant line was Ronald Bakalarz, President of MWU, who lashed out at the media for this unfounded criticism and condemnation, affirming that the movement will find the strength to overcome and persevere". (Jerusalem Post 25 July 1997).

- UZI NETANEL stated at the Knesset Special Committee Meeting in the Matter of the Maccabi Bridge Disaster on 7 September 1998: "I believe as a result of the events that have occurred so far, that it would not have mattered what we would have done. There would always have been other demands resulting from pressure from the families."

MWU Contact with the Victims:

For a period of nine months (except for contact initiated by Colin Elterman when he telephoned Mr. Bakalarz five months after the disaster who then responded by letter justifying the MWU position), MWU made no attempt to contact any of us. Mr. Bakalarz promised to make further contact with Mr. Elterman, but he never did. No one from MWU sought after our welfare notwithstanding that we lost loved ones and at the time Sasha was undergoing at least two or three brain/neck surgeries a month.

Uzi Netanel confirmed the lack of contact in his address to the Knesset on 7 September 1998 when he said: "There was contact when they were in Israel, but from the moment they returned to Australia the contact was severed."

However, in MWU's Special Report it pronounces: "We are a caring organization. This was our family. In the months following the bridge tragedy, we have tried to reach out to those most affected: the victims, the families of the dead and injured, to Maccabi Australia and the greater Australian Jewish community." Regrettably, this is not true.

Even the MWU Chronology of Events makes no mention of any contact with us for the months following the Disaster.

Safety and Organisational Failures

Having experienced the safety and organisational failures at the 15th Maccabiah we, Maccabi Australia and the Australian Community have demanded a complete organisational revamp and proper planning for future Maccabiot

We are deeply concerned that MWU does not consider that there were organisational failures and that it failed to accept real moral responsibility for what happened.

Maccabi Canada President and MWU executive member, Mr Roy Salomon on 5 January 1999 told the Knesset Committee in relation to organisational failures.

"For the statement to be made that there was improper management, before we were ready to march into the stadium, I want to tell this group here, that was the absolute best prepared organization that I have ever seen. We were in the greatest shape that I have ever seen Maccabi ... There was no mismanagement, that I can assure you. There was no mismanagement of these Games."

We and the Australian Jewish Community are very concerned that the current MWU leadership does not concede that there are flaws in its organization notwithstanding the Safety Committee MWU has established. What real value does this Committee have, being under the control and leadership of persons who have consistently denied any wrongdoing?

Support for Australia.

The Australian Jewish Community is deeply hurt that outside of Australia no-one in the Maccabi Movement, including Maccabi Canada has supported the Australians other than the provision of donations given shortly after the Disaster for which we are thankful.

However, we express our deep appreciation for the support and solidarity of Professor Irwin Cotler MP, Canadian delegates to the Commonwealth Jewish Council meeting in October 1999 who supported a motion seconded by Lord Janner QC supporting the Australian demands as a humanitarian gesture and the National President of Canadian Jewish Congress for taking the Australian case direct to the MWU leadership.

The 16th Maccabiah

Maccabi Australia for good reason, will not attend the next Maccabiah unless its requirements of MWU are satisfied If Australia does not attend, other countries including Canada should also stay away

The Maccabi Canada position is made very clear by Mr Salomon when he addressed the MWU Plenary meeting in Israel on May, 3 1999 saying: "But rest assured, when we all march into that stadium (at the next Maccabiah) we will be marching behind our two leaders: Uzi Netanel and Ronald Bakalarz."

Until issues in this sorry saga are resolved we urge you to show solidarity with us by withholding your support from MWU events, including the proposed 16th Maccabiah and pressure Maccabi Canada to ensure that MWU acts with integrity and compassion. It would be greatly appreciated if Canadians express support for their Australian brethren. We are distressed that there has been no support from Maccabi Canada.

MAKE YOUR VOICES HEARD

- Support our campaign for the removal of the President and Chairman of MWU until at least the conclusion of all legal and Knesset proceedings - it could have been one of you.
- refuse to participate in MWU events
- do not contribute to and promote MWU events
- insist that Maccabi Canada, a part of the Canadian Jewish Community demonstrate its solidarity with the entire Australian Jewish Community

so that we may all have confidence that true reform at MWU may commence, Maccabiot made safe and the rift with Australia be healed. After all, Canada was not far behind us on that fateful day.

No court of law can deal with questions of accountability, personal responsibility in a moral sense and issues which relate to the moral and ethical propriety of the behaviour of an international Jewish organization.

Until all these issues are properly addressed by MWU, any memorial service or expression of "sorrow" in a general sense and motherhood statements concerning Zionism are meaningless and empty to us. Yes, MWU did bring us to Israel - four did not return.

Zachor

On March 4, 1974, the bodies of three sisters, Mazal, Laura and Farah Zebac, and their cousin Eva Saad were discovered in a cave in Syria near the Lebanese border. The four young women had been raped, robbed, murdered and mutilated. They had been trying to leave Syria to build a life for themselves elsewhere; but they failed, and with that failure, they met their deaths.

The girls' bodies, stuffed into sacks like unwanted detritus, were returned to their parents on the Shabbat before Purim, the Shabbat known as Zachor – the imperative form in Hebrew of remember – named after the additional Torah portion and the prophetic reading read in synagogue as a historical prologue to the story of Purim.

Subsequently, Shabbat Zachor would become the annual day of remembrance throughout the Jewish world for the four murdered women and a rallying cry on behalf of Syrian Jews.

In two days, we arrive once again in the annual calendar cycle at Shabbat Zachor. Thankfully, the Jews of Syria no longer need rescue. All but a handful are now safely in the west.

But the Jews of Iran do. Next month, on April 13, the 13 Iranian Jews charged with spying for Israel and the United States, will be tried. If convicted, the accused could face the death penalty. Ten of the accused have been in custody since March 31 of last year. The remaining three were released on bail last month.

The fact that the trials will take place in Iran, the modern incarnation of ancient Persia, the locale in which the Purim story unfolded more than 2,000 years ago, is an irony not to be overlooked.

In the chilling, inspiring book, The Ransomed of God, which tells the story of the rescue of Syria's Jews and the remarkable role played by Judy Feld Carr in that rescue, author Harold Troper recounts a conversation in1986 between Feld Carr and the newly appointed director general of the Middle East Bureau in the Canadian Department of External Affairs, Percy Sherwood.

"As the meeting drew to a close, Sherwood asked Judy a question she rarely asked herself. Why was she so involved with the cause of Syrian Jews? Judy fumbled for an answer. She had trouble articulating what was for her emotional – something less reasoned than understood. It had to do with history, she explained. Jews all over the world, including those in Syria, are bound by a common historical thread. To deny the plight of Syrian Jews would be to deny that bond, to deny her own past and her people's past. That is why she could not turn her back..."

On this Shabbat Zachor let us remember the plight of the Jews of Iran. Let the "common historical thread"-that ties "Jews all over the world" bind our hearts and our actions to the 13 Jews who face the prosecutor's false accusations.

Let us not turn our backs on them.

CAPTIVE IN IRAN

The government of Iran still holds the following members of the Jewish community as prisoners. Each is a universe of life and existence unto his own. And each has a name. Let us not forget them.

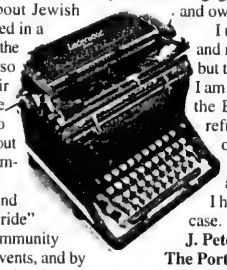
A Birthright awakening

I just got back from the Birthright Israel trip, the free trip to Israel offered to young Jews who have never been to Israel. Aside from having a great time in Israel, I witnessed something amazing.

Most people in my group were not very active in the Jewish community and most did not go to Jewish day schools and did not know much about Jewish history and traditions. What I witnessed in a mere 10 days was a total awakening in the group. It was truly amazing to see so many people fall in love with their religion. By the end of the trip, there was a genuine hunger in the group to learn more about Judaism and to help out in the Jewish community, and most importantly, to return to Israel.



I believe in the next few months and years, the group that went on a "free ride" to Israel will begin to pay back the community through their participation in Jewish events, and by sharing their new-found enthusiasm for Judaism. I think that this program has allowed young people to take an interest in the future of the community and will play a part in guaranteeing the vitality of the community well into the future.

Goldfaden brings to mind Zolotarefsky

Baruch Cohen's "The history of the Yiddish theatre" (CJN, March 2) generated a discussion among local admirers of Abraham Goldfaden, the founder of the Yiddish theatre.

It was acknowledged that playwright/actor Isidore Zolotarefsky was responsible for the founding of the Yiddish theatre in Canada. In March 1896, he brought a troupe of players from New York to Montreal to perform Goldfaden's popular operetta, Shulamis. The theatre was packed to overflowing for each of the three performances. After the last performance, the audience was asked whether it wished to have a Yiddish theatre in Montreal. The response was a resounding yes.

The tradition that began with Zolotarefsky continues to this day with the internationally renowned Yiddish Theatre of the Saidye Bronfman Centre.

Zolotarefsky collected popular theatrical verse in English and translated it into Yiddish, as well as translating Yiddish verse into English. In 1897, he published a pamphlet in Montreal containing these translations, very likely printed by A.L. Kaplansky, Canada's first Hebrew and Yiddish printer. It was the first major Yiddish imprint in Canada, but not a single copy has survived.

Looking for the Ely family

I hope through the pages of your newspaper, I will be able to get in touch with someone who might remember a Toronto family by the name of Ely for a book I'm working on. Mr. Harry S. Ely and his wife Freda purchased an estate island, known as Seven Mile Island, on Lake Scugog near Port Perry, Ont., in September 1943, and owned it until about 1958.

I understand Mr. Ely was a very well-known and respected tailor on King Street in Toronto, but this information has never been confirmed. I am told that during the 1940s, when owned by the Elys, the island property was used as a refugee camp for Jewish children smuggled out of Europe. Some local residents remember there being a number of children at the estate during the summer months, but I have not been able to confirm if this was the case.

Haider's publicity stunt

The members of the Raoul Wallenberg International Movement for Humanity and the Canadian Friends of Raoul Wallenberg were deeply shocked to learn that the name of Raoul Wallenberg, one of the greatest heroes of humanity, was used for propaganda by Joerg Haider.

In fact, the news about his visit to Canada caused us great concern. You can imagine our indignation when it was reported he was coming to the Raoul Wallenberg Monument and would pose in front of it. Obviously, it was done for publicity. There is no need to say that our organization had absolutely nothing to do with this event.

We express our complete solidarity with all those for whom the mere presence of Haider on Canadian soil was an unbearable affront.

Disappointed no True Blue coverage

I am terribly disappointed because I read absolutely nothing in your paper, about the True Blue campaign of the Toronto Police Association.

Not a word, not one comment. Why?

This was an important issue for Jews, for whom the spectre of a police state is all too vivid and recent. We, together with all civil minded citizens ought to be concerned about the police trying to grab political power and influence by coercion and intimidation.

Esther's is not, necessarily, the only Purim

By RABBI SHLOMO JAKOBOVITS

Purim can occur on any day of the year. Not, of course, the Purim enacted in Megillat Esther, the Purim that is observed by Jews worldwide – but a local Purim, sometimes referred to as a special Purim, or Purim Katan, observed in only a specified locality or by a particular family, yet modelled on the universal Purim. (The term Purim Katan also has a second meaning: it designates the 14th day of the first Adar in a year when the regular Purim occurs in the second Adar, such as this year.)

Throughout the ages, many a Jewish community has encountered enemies comparable to Haman. Sometimes the Jews succumbed to his persecution; in other instances there was a reversal of fortune, and they were saved. It was in such latter cases that the enactment of a local Purim would be considered, and its observance on that same date in future years would serve to commemorate that delivery from impending disaster. Where the sequence of events rendered it appropriate a taanit, day of fasting and slichot, was instituted on the day previous to the new Purim. A few instances follow.

Delivery from tyrants

The Purim of Cairo, also known as Purim Mitzraim, closely parallels the original Purim experience. The governor of Egypt, Ahmed Pasha, rose to be the powerful ruler of that land within the empire of Suleiman the Magnificent. He was jealous of the wealth and social status of the leading Jews, and in 1524 announced that unless an exorbitant sum of money was conveyed to him by the 28th of Adar that year, all Jews in Cairo would be massacred. The sum specified was beyond anything attainable, so in practice his intent was the extermination of Jewry. But Ahmed was also plotting against his Ottoman overlord, the Emperor Suleiman, and on the very day he had set as the Jews' deadline he was assassinated by soldiers loyal to Suleiman. Adar 28 was then proclaimed Purim of Cairo.

The villain of the Purim of Frankfurt, Vincent Fettmilch, actually referred to himself as the "new Haman of the Jews." He was an effective rabble-rouser who, in 1614, led the mob in attacks on the Jewish quarter. After two years of anti-Jewish agitation, he finally aroused the ire of the Holy Roman Emperor Matthias, who had him arrested and hanged. The local Jewish community thereupon established Adar 19 as a fast day and Adar 20 as Purim of Frankfurt. The story was written up as Megillat Vinz (for Vincent), which was then read annually on that day.

Another local Purim that occurs in Adar is the Purim of Rhodes, and this one falls on Adar 14, the very day of the universal Purim. Hence this island community observed Purim twice on the same day, with special ceremonies and piyutim (poetic prayers) added to the regular Purim ritual. In 1840, while the Damascus blood libel was at its height, the governor of Rhodes had accused local Jewry of committing the same alleged blood crime in Rhodes, and he threatened to annihilate the entire community. On Adar 14 his overlord, the Sultan, deposed the governor and declared the accusation to be false.

In some cases, the hated tyrant did not fall; the community in question merely escaped his sword. Such was the case with Medzibozh in 1648, one of the few places in that part of Poland not ravaged by the Chmielnicki hordes. Its Purim was set on Teveth 11, to mark this seemingly miraculous survival. A century later Medzibozh was to become famous as the seat of the Baal Shem Tov.

Different types of deliverance

Not always was the villain a powerful individual of the Haman type. In several instances, the danger derived from a bloodthirsty mob or from an invading army. In 1236, a Christian was accidentally killed in Narvona (Narbonne, France) in an argument with a Jew that led to blows. The Christians of the city rioted and threatened to destroy the Jewish quarter and everyone in it. The local commander and his soldiers appeared just in time to avert calamity. A Purim was instituted for Adar 21.

In Florence, Italy, Jews were saved from slaughter by a similar mob in 1790 through the intervention of the bishop, and Sivan 26 became the local Purim. Algiers instituted a Purim on Tamuz 11 to mark the defeat of an invading Spanish army in 1774. In Eretz Yisrael, the city of Tiberias proclaimed a Purim on Elul 4, the day local troops overcame a siege by a hostile army in 1743.

In some cases, the villain was an informer who tried to bring ruin on the community through malicious reports to government. Such was the case in Saragossa, Spain, in 1420. The informer was an apostate Jew, and when his plot was foiled, a local Purim was proclaimed on Shvat 17, and a megillah was written for the annual celebration. This megillah is remarkable for its exceptionally close similarity, in style and terminology, to Megillat Esther. It also has the special characteristic of appending to the informer's name, every time it appears in the text, the curse Yimach Sh'mo, "his name be eradicated." This may well be one of the earliest examples of such usage of this expression, which by today has become commonplace.

Not every Purim commemorates the reversal of a threat to Jews. In Grenada, one of the Spanish lands, the king, a Muslim, appointed Shmuel Hanagid to command his army. In a series of battles in 1038-9, Shmuel led his country to victory, and the Jews of Grenada celebrated by instituting a Purim on Elul 1, albeit they had not been threatened as Jews. This is the oldest local occasion on record to be accorded the name Purim.

In Verona, Italy, Jews were confined to the ghetto in 1599. It was their request that they be the holders of keys to the gates, and that the ghetto thus be locked each night from the inside, not from outside. The day this plea was granted, Tammuz 18, was proclaimed a Purim, in 1607, and the observance of it continued till Napoleon abolished the ghetto in 1797. The theme of the annual celebration was an expression of satisfaction in segregation; this community felt that ghetto-life had more advantages than disadvantages – at least when Jews hold the keys.

The event commemorated is in several cases a saga of surviving a natural disaster. The community of Ancona, Italy, during the 17th and 18th centuries, instituted four separate dates of local Purim. In each instance they were saved from destruction: in one case the peril was revolutionary riots, in one case earthquake, and in two cases fire.

The family Purim

Not always does a local Purim apply to the entire locality. Some events were more personal, to be observed only by the family and its descendants.

Rabbi Yomtov Lipman Heller, author of Tosefoth Yomtov, became chief rabbi of Bohemia in 1627. The Thirty Year War was at that time escalating, and the government imposed a heavy tax on the Jewish community to help pay war costs. Rabbi Heller headed the Jewish committee charged in 1629 with apportioning to each individual his share of the collective tax. Naturally there were those who felt they had been assessed too high, and some of these individuals were unscrupulous enough to turn to the government with a roster of slanderous accusations against Rabbi Heller. On the fifth of Tammuz he was summoned to the capital, Vienna, and sentenced to fine and imprisonment. For 15 years he experienced repeated sufferings, and Tammuz 5 was proclaimed a family taanit. This dark era in his life ended when he became rabbi of Krakow on the first of Adar, 1644, and that day was proclaimed a family Purim. He recorded his misfortunes in his Megillat Eiva, Chronicle of Enmity, and that Purim is still observed today by some branches of the Heller family.

Rabbi Avraham Danzig, author of Chai Adam, lived in Vilna. In 1804, a powder magazine exploded and demolished the housing complex where he resided, killing 31 people. The rabbi and his family survived, but all of them were injured. He proclaimed Kislev 15 to be a family taanit, and the following day a family Purim. Chai Adam is one of the most widely followed halachic works of the last two centuries. It devotes more space to the topic of private Purim than any other compendium of Jewish law, and he presents details concerning appropriate prayers and observances.

How many such Purim days are there? The total number will never be known, there being no central registry of local proclamations. Of those that are known, the most comprehensive list is in the Encyclopedia Judaica (13:1395), where 109 are enumerated. Almost 20 percent of these are in Adar.

Another aspect that cannot be determined precisely is the extent and duration of observance. It varied widely. In a few cases, the local tradition was observed only the first several years. But where records exist, the indications are that in most cities, observance was maintained for generations, and sometimes for centuries, as in the above case of Verona. Purim of Shiraz, Persia, was instituted in 1400 and observed for over 500 years.

Why call it Purim?

Why was Purim chosen, and not Pesach or Chanukah, each of which likewise celebrates Jewish redemption from the designs of our enemies?

There are several reasons why Purim, only a few of which can be cited here. In a practical sense, Pesach or Chanukah would hardly meet the case, because the events in question called for an annual one-day celebration, not seven or eight days. In some cases, as already cited, the saga was such that a previous fast-day was also instituted, and this, again, is parallel only with Purim.

Perhaps the strongest support for designating such local observances specifically as Purim comes from the Megillah itself. The precedent is set right there, and it is a precedent unique to Purim. On the basis of events that happened in Shushan, this one city established its own Purim with local focus, on Adar 15, one day after the regular Purim. This day is still observed to a certain extent, and it is still called Shushan Purim. Thus the first local Purim was instituted at the same time as Purim itself.

Smiles for a change

Every once in a while I receive copies of students' essays on biblical subjects. Here are some samples with their original spellings.

From elementary and high school students:

Lot's wife was a pillar of salt by day, but a ball of fire by night.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The Jews were a proud people and throughout history they had trouble with the unsympathetic Genitals.

The Egyptians were all drowned in the dessert. Afterwards, Moses went up on Mount Cyanide to get the ten ammendments.

The first commandment was when Eve told Adam to eat the apple.

The seventh commandment is "Thou shalt not admit adultery."

Moses died before he ever reached Canada.

Then Joshua led the Hebrews in the battle of Geritol.

David was a Hebrew king skilled at playing the liar. He fought with the Finkelsteins, a race of people who lived in biblical times.

Solomon, one of David's sons, had 300 wives and 700 porcupines.

From college students:

Civilization woozed out of the Nile about 300,000 years ago. The Nile was a river that had some water in it. Every year it would flood and irritate the land. This tended to make the people nervous.

There was Upper Egypt and Lower Egypt. Lower Egypt was actually farther up than Upper Egypt, which was, of course, lower down than the upper part. This is why we learn geography as a factor in history.

Rulers were entitled Faroes. A famed one was King Toot. It was a special custom among them not to marry their wives. O'Cyrus, a god who lived in a piramid, would give you the afterlife if your sole was on straight.

Mesapatamia was squigged in a valley near the Eucaliptus river. Flooding was erotic. Babylon was similar to Egypt because of the differences they had apart from each other. Egypt, for example, had only Egyptians, but Babylon had Summarians, Acadians and Canadians, to name just a few. People were alaud democratic freedoms like taking an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. King Nebodresser lived in a hanging garden just to please his Hutterite wife.

The history of the Jewish people begins with Abraham, Isaac and their 12 children. Judyism was the first monolithic religion. Old Testament profits include Moses, Amy and Confucious, who believed in Fidel Piety. Moses was told by Jesus Christ to lead the people out of Egypt into the Sahara Desert. The Book of Exodus describes this trip and the amazing things that happened on it, including the Ten Commandments, various special effects and the building of the Suez Canal.

Dealing with history

It's called the Six Day War, but not in my history textbook. There, the brief 1967 conflict between Israel and its neighbours is named the June War. It irks me every time I read it and makes me question whether taking Middle East history was a smart idea.

Jennifer Fox on campus in Halifax

History of the Middle East: 1798-present is just a half-credit elective, something to fill my timetable. I've always enjoyed history, discovering what makes a place tick. The Middle East course, however, is more than my inquisitive mind can take.

I'm absolutely fine when the discussion has nothing to do with Israel or Palestine. British oil concessions in Iran – fine. The creation of Turkish state – fascinating. But call Israel Palestine or refer to events I am familiar with by using different names and my heart rate spikes.

My professor, who's neither Jewish nor Muslim, is trying her best to keep all things fair and equal. Her job is to debunk the myths surrounding a heated and much-argued debate. The 1948 War of Independence is the called the First Arab-Israeli War. It's a neutral name that doesn't offend either side, although the textbook does note that many Arab leaders refer to the war as the "disaster."

I have to roll my eyes when I hear the creation of a Jewish homeland called a disaster. I try to understand. It's not the textbook author, William L. Cleveland's personal belief that Israel is a disaster. He's only educating us students about how it's seen by certain groups.

What I don't get is how the name Six Day War could offend anyone?

Cleveland says the war lasted six days. He's not trying to hide that fact.

So why call it the June War?

Usually the name of a war tells something about the conflict. The French Revolution suggests there was a revolution – in France. The 100 Years War, even though it was longer than 100 years, tells students it was a long, drawn-out conflict. The June War doesn't reveal anything. All I know is that somebody somewhere fought someone in June of some year for some reason.

My frustration over the labelling of wars tells me I'm not ready to discuss Israel at a secular school. Israel has made mistakes and has done some nasty things, like every other nation in the history of this planet but I really, really want Israel to be the good guy. I can't in the least be objective and it bugs me.

I should be able to separate my pro-Israel Jewish feelings from my academic pursuits. In a perfect world, I wouldn't mutter Israel under my breath when my professor says Palestine. I could explain the significance of the Balfour Declaration on a mid-term exam without worrying that I'll be docked marks for an obvious bias. I shouldn't care what wars are called.

If I took this course at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem or even at a school with a huge Jewish population, such as York University in Toronto, would I have this problem? The same historic events would probably be given a very different slant with a Jewish professor or in a class full of Jews. I wouldn't leave class with my hands and teeth clenched. I wouldn't be seeing anti-Israel sentiment in the textbook on the smallest provocation.

I've never been so defensive about history. Not even when I studied the Middle Ages and the power of the Church did I get this stressed. I want to learn about Israel's history so that I can begin to understand what's happening now, but I can't stop being myself for three hours a week.

I'm disappointed with myself. I wasn't ready to take this course.

Grab your graggers!

Grab your graggers. Pick the poppy seeds out of the hamantaschen. I love Purim – and it's not only because my bubbie makes the best hamantaschen in town (recipe omitted to protect uniqueness of the product).

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

The holiday of Purim marks the onset of a season rather than simply the celebration of the deliverance of the Jews of Persia, some time in the fifth century BCE, by Esther and her cousin (the son of her father's brother) Mordechai. It is the beginning of a season of transitions, as well as one of bubbling activity. The snow is melting, thus reducing the chance that at Purim masquerades, every four-year-old will show up dressed like Frosty. Mid-term stress has shifted to final exam panic and my snack food shifts from the healthy category to the sole consumption of my Bubby's hamantaschen.

Our city, which has been deserted for months by snowbirds who have headed south, becomes replenished as they return from their Florida getaways. People are congregating more frequently and more visibly, largely due to improved weather conditions, and all this is making me happy. Barren streets, grey skies and people bundled up so warmly that their noses become indistinguishable from their eyes depress me. I like seeing people out and doing things.

The Purim fever is now in the air.

Events that typically accompany the Purim season are the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) March Madness charity pools, university graduation balls, student society elections, Expos spring training, and spring breaks for those fortunate enough to have spring break come in the spring and be a break as opposed to a reading week.

I get excited about the beginning of this season as soon as the planning for the annual Purim party gets under way. Unlike other seasons dictated by the Gregorian calendar, which await the solstices and equinoxes to bless us with their presence, the Purim season begins with a fast and then a party. The student crowd at the party is seeking refuge from their textbooks and is hoping to have an all-you-can-have good time. The night commences with a far from traditional Megillah reading, consistently interrupted by the DJ's music infusing modernity into the celebration of our historic holiday.

And then the party progresses as a party should progress. Our track record for Purim party attendance here is overwhelming, attracting over 750 students and having to turn many away. While planning begins a month or so before the event, the success of the party one year helps to publicize the event for the following year. People have been calling Hillel House since January to find out this year's details.

As many of you will be reading this, the party I am ranting and raving about (I don't even know how I know what goes on, since last year I couldn't get in) will be going on or will already have produced hamantaschen-hungry students. Should the latter be the case, consider this as advertising for next year.

I like the Purim season because it signals the approach of summer, because it guarantees that my bubbie's hamantaschen will make their way into our kitchen (although they don't tend to last very long) and because, unlike with the onset of the Gregorian months, I can sense change.

For example, when spring arrives on March 21, there is still snow on the ground and I rub my eyes in disbelief that someone is trying to convince me spring is here, because it's not. And by Dec. 21, there is often enough snow on the ground already to make us think that winter began back in mid-October. And so, even though it is customary to masquerade in costumes on Purim, the holiday season does not imply deceit; it tells many truths and offers us a reason to celebrate – the Purim season is finally here!

Grab your graggers and I'll take care of the hamantaschen order.

Israel's quagmire in Lebanon

It was a precise moment historians will remember as a turning point in Israel's costly, often futile and exasperating military embroilment in Lebanon, a source of incessant Arab-Israeli tension since 1968. On March 5, in a unanimous decision, Prime Minister Ehud Barak's cabinet voted to withdraw Israeli troops from Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon, with or without a peace agreement with Syria.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The withdrawal is expected to take place on or before July 7, the first anniversary of Barak's accession to office. Barak, in his election campaign, promised to "bring back the boys" within a year, and now he has taken the first step in fulfilling this pledge.

The pivotal shift has been in the making since Yitzhak Rabin proposed a plan whereby an Israeli pullout from Lebanon would be directly contingent on Lebanon's ability to disarm Hezbollah and thereby eliminate the reason for Israel's presence on its territory.

Rabin wanted the Lebanese army to deploy southward to the international border and prove, over a six-month period, that it was capable of bringing a measure of stability to Lebanon. Pressed by Syria, Lebanon rejected the proposal that could have ended the deadly war of attrition between Israel and Hezbollah. Instead, Lebanon – a Syrian protectorate – called on Israel to leave unconditionally.

Syria opposed the proposal because it ran counter to its strategy of bottling up Israel in the security zone until it agreed to evacuate the Golan Heights. Through its proxy, Hezbollah, Syria exerted pressure on Israel to give up the Golan, captured in the Six Day War.

In one of his first diplomatic initiatives, Benjamin Netanyahu tried to make an end run around Syria by offering to withdraw in exchange for assurances that Hezbollah would be disbanded, that Israel's northern border would be stabilized, and that the members of Israel's ally, the South Lebanon Army, would not be prosecuted as traitors.

Taking its cue from Syria, the power broker in Lebanon since its armed intervention in the 1975-1990 civil war, the Lebanese government rebuffed Israel once again. It was clear that Damascus would not countenance an Israeli withdrawal unless Israel was ready to relinquish the Golan as part of an accord with Syria. In the meantime, Israel was bled white by Hezbollah in a guerrilla war. On average per year, 20 to 30 Israeli soldiers have been killed in Lebanon.

In January 1998, with the mounting number of Israeli casualties in Lebanon, Israel's defence minister, Yitzhak Mordechai, put another proposal on the table. He declared that Israel would accept all facets of United Nations Security Council resolution 425, passed in the wake of Operation Litani, Israel's first full-scale invasion of Lebanon in March 1978.

Mounted in retaliation for a Palestinian terrorist raid that resulted in the deaths of 37 Israeli civilians, Israel's incursion stopped at the Litani River. In accordance with resolution 425, Israel pulled back and allowed a new UN contingent, the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL), to try to maintain the peace in southern Lebanon.

Israel, however, kept UNIFIL away from the international border, preferring to patrol that stretch of Lebanon with its own entrenched forces and the newly formed South Lebanon Army, led by a disaffected former Lebanese army officer, Major Saad Haddad.

In accepting resolution 425 in its entirety, Mordechai hoped that the Lebanese army would be able to restore peace in southern Lebanon. Thirty nine Israeli soldiers had been killed there in 1997, including 12 naval commandos wiped out in an ambush, and Israel was clearly eager to withdraw. But Lebanon and Syria rejected the overture, and so the war ground on relentlessly.

Around this time, the first unambiguous calls about the need for a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon were heard from mainstream Israeli politicians. Yossi Beilin, the current justice minister and the former deputy foreign minister, was in the forefront of those advocating a unilateral pullout.

Avigdor Kahalani, the then police minister and a tank commander on the Golan during the 1973 Yom Kippur War, also joined the chorus. Kahalani's calculation was that a withdrawal from Lebanon would strengthen Israel's grip on the Golan by removing the meddlesome Syrian factor. (Ariel Sharon, the architect of the 1982 invasion and a new convert to the cause, holds an identical view.)

But a unilateral withdrawal was still not in the cards. Netanyahu and Mordechai, as well as the chief of staff, Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, considered it a bad idea. And in an uncharacteristic display of bluster, Lipkin-Shahak boasted, "We can live with the present situation in Lebanon for another 1,000 years."

The boast was counter-productive, as it induced the commander of Israeli forces in Lebanon, Amiram Levine, to call for a gradual withdrawal, with or without a peace treaty with Syria. Speaking for many Israelis, Levine said that Israel "cannot and must not accept" casualties in a war where a clean, outright victory is simply impossible.

Israel formally established the security zone in 1985, three years after its massive, ill-conceived invasion of Lebanon, during which the PLO was ousted from bases there. Since then, Israel has bitterly learned that Lebanon is a quagmire for conventional armies battling an agile, resourceful and stubborn enemy. Hezbollah is openly backed by Iran and Syria. Iran sends weapons and funds, while Syria supplies logistical support.

Despite its advantages in manpower and equipment, Israel has failed to wear down Hezbollah, whose fighters are recruited from Lebanon's generally impoverished and underprivileged Shi'ite Muslim community.

In recent years, Israel has launched two major bombardments of Lebanon – Operation Accountability (1993) and Operation Grapes of Wrath (1996) – and bombed Lebanon's infrastructure, but to no avail.

By the terms which ended Operation Grapes of Wrath, the Israeli army is boxed into a tight little corner of Lebanon, its storied mobility and maneuverability blocked. And contrary to the rules of engagement, civilians have in fact been targeted, intentionally or otherwise, by both sides.

Within the security enclave, Israeli soldiers have become sitting ducks, the victims of roadside bombs, mines, ambushes and missile strikes. In a recent two-week period, seven Israeli soldiers and the second-in-command of the South Lebanon Army were slain, prompting Israel to bomb power stations near Beirut and to warn Lebanon that it would retaliate harshly for attacks on Israeli soldiers.

The latest developments, coming on the heels of Israel's decision to use its air power against Hezbollah far more frequently than in the past, have stiffened Barak's resolve to abandon the security zone altogether. The Israeli army had opposed a unilateral withdrawal. But last November, four months after the South Lebanon Army unilaterally retreated from Jezzine, a town just north of the security zone, Gen. Shaul Mofaz – the chief of staff – had a change of heart.

Barak would, of course, prefer a withdrawal to coincide with the signing of a historic peace treaty with Syria. But, judging by the suspension of the Syrian talks in January, this scenario may not materialize. Barak, probably rightly so, is convinced that Israel can better defend its interests and reduce casualties from fortified outposts in Israel rather than in Lebanon. It is a gamble worth taking after the disasters in Lebanon.

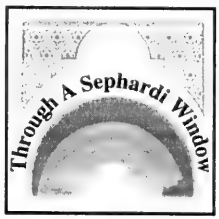
Elias Canetti

"Every decision is liberating, even if it leads to disaster. Otherwise, why do so many people walk upright and with open eyes into their misfortune?"

This quote by writer Elias Canetti reflects a common theme in his work.



Hardly known in North America, Canetti was at the centre of European literary and philosophical circles throughout most of the last five decades.

Often referred to as a shy and reclusive writer, his works reflect the themes of death and the Nazi regime. He is most widely recognized for winning the 1981 Nobel Prize in Literature.

Canetti was born in 1905 in Russ, Bulgaria, to a Sephardi family whose ancestors were driven out of Canete (a town just outside Valencia) in 1492 – hence his surname Canetti. His ancestors fled to Turkey living there for several hundred years before settling in Bulgaria.

His literary sophistication was acquired by attending schools in Vienna, Zurich and Frankfurt. He received a doctorate in chemistry in 1929. Chemistry, however, was clearly not his passion. Canetti was destined to write about his reflections of the world around him.

His exposure to different European social climates resulted in publications in diverse genres, primarily written in German. By the time he died in 1994, Canetti's body of work included a novel, three plays, several volumes of notes and aphorisms, a travel book, portraits of authors, character studies and memoirs.

His writings were deeply influenced by his escape from Austria to London via Paris in 1938 due to the Nazi occupation. One of his most famous works, Masse und Macht (Crowds and Power), was an effort to pinpoint the character of mass movements – a phenomenon related to the rise of Nazism.

According to Canetti, the origin of the masse is the religion of power. Deep down behind every command, every exercise of power, is the threat of death. Survival itself becomes the nucleus of power. Thus he believed masses are controlled by an ensuing threat to their survival.

A comment made by Canetti upon receiving his Nobel Prize sums up his desire for a better world: "Today, since Hiroshima, everyone knows what war is, and the fact that everyone knows is our only hope."

Reconciling science and religion

How We Believe, The Search for God in an Age of Science*, by Michael Shermer (W.H. Freeman and Company).

Recent surveys indicate that well over 90 percent of North Americans believe in God. Questions abound: How deep does this belief go and how does it translate into daily behaviour? Is this widespread faith reasoned and thoughtful or is it largely based on feeling and emotion? Does belief grow weaker or stronger with the passing years? Why do more people believe in God today than at the turn of the century? Why are more North Americans than Europeans influenced by religion? Why do messianic ideas proliferate throughout history? Can a questing individual find spiritual meaning in a largely secular age?

These are complex and profound questions and they are at the core of Shermer's provocative and wide-ranging study. The author is a college instructor, the publisher of Skeptic Magazine, and host of the California radio show, Science Talk.

Books
Bernard Baskin

After considering a group of philosophical and scientific arguments for the existence of God, the author concludes that no satisfactory proof can be adduced. He maintains that science is a process of inquiry aimed at building a testable body of knowledge that is constantly open to confirmation or rejection. Its findings are provisional, fluid and ever changing. Religion, on the other hand, is the affirmation of a set of beliefs aimed at providing moral teaching and finding ultimate meaning in the universe. Its truths, necessarily are final and validated by faith.

The author insists that religionists make a mistake when they try to bolster faith by making use of the teachings or ideas of science. "Attempts to provide scientific proof of God are not only an insult to science; to those who are deeply religious they are an insult to God."

A major shortcoming of the book is the author's inability to comprehend or consider the mystical and emotional aspects of religion, its drama, poetry, colour and ritual.

Shermer's basic conclusions run counter to a recent shift in Western intellectual thinking in which science and faith are not on a collision course. Indeed, many notions are now percolating in scientific circles that are God-friendly. They imply the creation of the world by design rather than chance. This new reality is summed up by the astronomer, Fred Hoyle, originator of the term "big bang." He once said, "An explosion in the junkyard does not lead to sundry bits of metal being assembled into a useful working machine."

For the questing reader How We Believe is rich with the speculations of many scientists about religion and offers fresh insights into age-old questions. Although a non-believer, the author is respectful toward religion and reflective about its paramount place in society.

Journey to the promised land

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Mary Antin, born in the Lithuanian (now Belarussian) town of Polotsk in 1881, recorded her memoirs of the Old Country and of coming to America in The Promised Land, a book first published in 1911.

The Promised Land is a valuable first-person account of the myriad concerns and experiences surrounding the journey from the squalid shtetl to the goldene medina – from the poverty-stricken village to the gleaming land of opportunity.

In the early 1890s, when Antin's family undertook the voyage, the Jews had been expelled from Moscow and had poured into the Pale of Settlement. "Passover," Antin writes, "was celebrated in tears that year." In place of the traditional prayer of "Next year in Jerusalem" came the fervent wish, "Next year in America."

The entire neighbourhood became excited when the family's steamer tickets arrived, she writes. "[They] wanted to handle the ticket, and mother must read them what is written on it. How much did it cost? Was it all paid for? Were we going to have a foreign passport or did we intend to steal across the border? Were we not all going to have new dresses to travel in? Was it sure that we could get kosher food on the ship?"

The family was besieged with good wishes, suggestions and advice. They were told to see the Lubavitcher Rebbe to get his blessing; to pack plenty of Zwieback in case only treif was available aboard ship; to sew their money into the linings of their clothes to avoid being robbed by the police at Castle Garden.

Meanwhile, the 10-year-old Mary stepped through town with a new sense of self-importance. "It was delicious…to be stopped and questioned at every shop door, when I ran out to buy two kopecks' worth of butter; to be treated with respect by my former playmates…; to be pointed at by my enemies, as I passed them importantly on the street."

A clutch of friends saw them off at the train station. "The last I saw of Polotsk was an agitated mass of people, waving coloured handkerchiefs and other frantic bits of calico, madly gesticulating, falling on each other's necks, gone wild altogether. Then the station became invisible, and the shining tracks spun out from sky to sky."

The family visited relatives in Vilna, then continued by train over the German border to Berlin, then to Hamburg, where they were confined to a prison-like quarantine barracks for two weeks. Finally they boarded a steamship which crossed an often tormented sea.

Settling into an immigrant section of Boston, the family attempted to integrate into the new land as quickly as possible. "We had to visit the stores and be dressed from head to foot in American clothing; we had to learn the mysteries of the iron stove, the washboard, and the speaking-tube; we had to learn the trade with the fruit pedlar through the window, and not to be afraid of the policeman; and, above all; we had to learn English."

They also shed their Hebrew names. Maryashe became Mary; Fetchke, Frieda; Dvorah, Dora.

Her parents set up a tenement store and sold flour, sugar, potatoes, crackers, kerosene, soap, kindling wood and penny candy. Mary's mother, especially, made rapid progress with English and "soon lost all sense of disadvantage, and conducted herself behind the counter very much as if she were back in her old store in Polotsk."

This tale celebrating these unsung pioneers is accessible online at www.lb.cs.cmu.edu/~mmbt/women/antin/land/land.html.

Purim food with a twist

The Jewish Highway

Last week we looked at Purim traditions from around the world. Today Purim food with a twist, courtesy of the largest Jewish cookbook in the world, the Jewish Highway.

One of the most popular traditions of the holiday is mishloach manot, sending a minimum of two items of food to one person [http: //www.ohr.org.il/special/purim/index.htm]. These days that usually means a basket of store-bought, sugar-laden candies. But there are some creative alternatives. Beit HaChatulim is a Jewish Vegetarian Homeschool in Sharon, Mass. Their site includes a healthy serving of philosophy and recipes [http:// www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/mishloach.htm]. Here's how they fill their mishloach manot baskets: hamantaschen, marshmallow brownies, caramel popcorn, apple bread and something called ding-bats (dates, pecans and Rice Crispies.) You can find recipes for these goodies at their site.

The people at Virtual Jerusalem ask why send the same-old same-old when you can use your imagination [http://www.vjholidays. com/purim/shalach.htm].

"One year I delivered a breakfast shalach mana: a cup of hot coffee, bagel, butter, hard boiled egg and orange juice. Another year, it was a head of lettuce, tomato, cucumber, avocado and small jar of homemade herb salad dressing. Other memorable mishloach manot: one with an almond theme – chocolate with almonds, marzipan, roasted almonds, almond liqueur, and almond brownies. Another with a fish theme: a small can of tuna, gummy fish, chocolate fish, etc."

As for drink, there is the well-known – and curious – custom of becoming so drunk that you don't know the difference between Mordechai and Haman.

Eli Birnbaum points out that "there are no absolutes in this world other than God. Everything can be used for good and evil. So too we celebrate our salvation from Haman by showing that even intoxication can be used to elevate one's soul." Eli likes to elevate his soul with his homemade Israeli Orange Brandy which he is good enough to share with us [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/drink.htm].

Purim is unique among all the holidays in the calendar in that we enjoy the festive meal as the day is winding down [http://www.vjholidays.com/purim/seuda.htm]. No boiled chicken for Joni Schockett at that festive meal. She looks east to Iran, Iraq and ancient Persia for her Purim inspiration [http://www. jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=837].

How about Crusty Spicy Rice along with Tangy Tangerine Chicken topped off by chickpea-filled pastry? The Jewish food Purim Archives recommend Persian Lamb, Apricot Pilaf with Ghouribi (Moroccan sugar cookies) [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/purindex.htm].

All these meals sound delicious but Rabbi Susan Fendrick prefers to turn her Purim dinner into one gigantic kosher joke [http://www. jewishfamily.com /scripts/NewJfl/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=869].

She serves up a "mock treif" banquet with fake versions of foods that are normally off limits for kosher-keeping Jews. "One friend is making ceviche, a Mexican dish usually made with scallops that will be made instead with fish. Other dishes include cheese 'burgers' (made with one of the delicious vegetarian burgers available), BLT's (bacon, lettuce and tomato sandwiches) made with fake 'bacon,' and 'crab' salad made with an imitation product."

But for Rabbi Fendrick, there is method to her mad meal. "Purim gives us a chance, while staying just within the bounds of the rules as we understand them, to show that nothing is too sacred to be made fun of. As a kid, I was sure of only one thing about God's nature: that it included a sense of humour. I hope She'll be laughing and celebrating along with us on this day, when we remember heroic deeds which saved our people, and demonstrate that part of survival is never taking life, our tradition, or ourselves, too seriously."

Breaking down walls: Blacks and Jews talk

By LAUREN KRUGEL
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

The crowd hushes as Rosemary Sadlier, the president of the Ontario Black History Society, steps up to the podium to address us at the Blacks and Jews – Let's Talk event.

Anticipating her speech, I am surprised to hear the sound of broken glass instead. Sadlier has accidentally broken a lamp sitting beside her on the stage, but this does not faze her. In fact, she continues to poke fun at herself throughout the rest of her speech.

The next speaker, Toni Silberman, chair of B'nai Brith's Ontario League for Human Rights, makes light of the incident. Besides the many ties that bind the Jews and blacks, she says, a tendency to break glass can be added to the list.

Toronto's Jewish and black communities were breaking more than just glass at this event in late February. They were breaking down walls that have stood between our two communities for decades. By engaging blacks and Jews together in dialogue, the hope was that we could team up to fight anti-Semitism and racism together.

Prior to this evening, it hadn't really occurred to me that animosity existed between blacks and Jews. However, I could not fathom how these two groups would come together in the first place. After all, Jewish identity is religious and cultural, while black identity is racial and cultural.

Racial harmony

Both communities have had their struggles integrating into Canada. But most of Toronto's Jewish population is of European descent, which makes it easier to assimilate into our predominantly white society.

Blacks, however, still struggle with being a visible minority. This event was organized to encourage Jews and blacks to embrace their similarities instead of fixating on their differences.

Sadlier enlightened us on some of the struggles the two groups have had to overcome. Both Jews and blacks have been on the receiving end of persecution for centuries and have fallen victim to slavery. In Nazi Germany, signs reading, "No dogs or Jews allowed" were posted in public places. Until only a few decades ago, blacks were banned from restaurants and other public places across North America. Both groups have been discriminated against, merely because of their beliefs or their skin-colour.

After several speakers described their experiences with racism and anti-Semitism, we had an opportunity to share our ideas in small groups. I was part of a group of eight people who exchanged views about the relationship between Jews and blacks. I admit, I was afraid to express my ideas at first. Surrounded mostly by people twice my age, I was just a tad intimidated.

The open nature of the discussion made me realize that a key factor in working towards racial and cultural harmony is communication – something that people tend to avoid outside their own familiar bubbles. The interaction yielded a flood of innovative ideas. Voices were raised and the facilitators at each table struggled to keep up with the passionate discussions, while furiously taking notes.

Unlike the majority at our table, I've never had an experience with prejudice or anti-Semitism. My ancestors had to deal with unbearable persecution in the old country, but any knowledge I have of anti-Semitism is second hand. Throughout the discussion, I was afraid of saying something foolish or uneducated. I mean, what does a 17-year-old suburban brat like me know about hardships anyway?

Solidarity was a recurring theme throughout the evening – keeping a sense of racial unity while reaching out to others. Existing bonds were reinforced and new ones were created.

Despite my paranoia, everyone at the table was very accepting. I realized that although I have never been persecuted, I can still relate to blacks and other Jews who have been. The anti-Semitism my family had to endure back in Europe contributed to who I am today, which is something I had been taking for granted.

Every time we become aware of a similarity that binds two seemingly different groups, we come one baby step closer to achieving racial harmony.

Taking care of business: Rabbi Kelman on ethics

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Business ethics are of such importance in Judaism that the Torah has about 125 commandments relating to money and commerce, compared to only about two dozen regarding kashrut.

Rabbi Jay Kelman – who is a chartered accountant and associate rabbi of Beth Jacob Synagogue – shared that tidbit as part of a session on Jewish Business Ethics, the last of a three-part series on Jewish Ethics in our Everyday Lives, run by UJA FEDERATION's professions cabinet.

In fact, said Rabbi Kelman, the first question we are asked when we meet our Maker is whether we were honest in our business dealings, according to the Talmud.

"How a Jew acts with his money will tell us if he has faith in God," said the rabbi. "Trying to cheat, or beat the system, shows a lack of faith in God."

> 'How a Jew acts with his money will tell us if he has faith in God'

It's human nature to want more than you have, he noted, but the truly rich person is one who is happy with his own lot, even if his neighbour has more than he does.

"Ultimately, we believe that our money is not our money, [but] that God has granted us our money to spend in the proper way."

Among the practical examples Rabbi Kelman discussed, he said the Talmud stresses that we have to be honest with Jew and non-Jew alike.

Judaism is also very strict on conflict of interest issues, he said. "Whenever there is a conflict, you must tell the person...When I sell something I am obligated to tell everything that's wrong with the product. I can say what's good about the product, but I also have to tell what's bad."

Even issues such as pricing are addressed in Jewish law. For a necessary product, one cannot charge more than one sixth above its market value, said Rabbi Kelman.

Although Jews are obligated by Jewish law to follow the laws of the country in which they live, Judaism has no concept of bankruptcy or limited liability, the rabbi said. "Judaism believes there's a moral type of responsibility for the shareholders and managers [who] are morally and personally responsible for what happens in a corporation."

The presentation also addressed issues facing the average consumer, like using a cash transaction to avoid paying GST and PST (not allowed).

"This has caused me untold grief," Rabbi Kelman noted. When he turns down the opportunity to avoid tax, he said, "people look at me like I'm nuts...Sometimes it's lonely."

In response to an audience question, the rabbi noted there is nothing wrong in asking for a discount equivalent to the tax, as long as the tax is paid.

Immigration consultant pleads guilty

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto immigration consultant has pleaded guilty to knowingly counselling Russian emigrants to falsely claim they were persecuted because they were Jewish.

Galina Slipachenko pleaded guilty earlier this month to two counts under the Immigration Act of counselling two Russian couples to make false declarations.

Ontario Provincial Court Judge Paul Reinhardt handed Slipachenko a one-year conditional sentence. She won't go to jail, but she is prohibited from traveling without permission, and she must observe an 11 p.m. curfew and report to authorities regularly.

A two-year investigation by the RCMP revealed that Slipachenko, who has run an immigration consulting business in Toronto with her husband Sergei for years, would travel to Russia to hold workshops on immigrating to Canada. She advised customers to obtain a visitor's visa for the United States, and then make a claim for refugee status at the Canadian border, saying that as Jews, they had been the targets of anti-Semitic persecution in their homeland.

The court heard that Slipachenko picked up one couple in New York and drove them to the border.

"She told them to go to the customs office and say they were persecuted in Russia because of their religion," said Crown lawyer Hugh Connolly. "They were worried because this was not true."

The couple paid $12,500 for Slipachenko's services.

Another couple paid $60,000 to be taken to the border crossing at Buffalo. In an earlier meeting, Slipachenko had "dictated a story for the refugee claim," Connolly said.

The stories of persecution and anti-Semitism, apparently, were convincing. Both couples were granted asylum by the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB).

Slipachenko also pleaded guilty to fraud for placing false extension stamps in the passports of three Israelis who had been visiting Canada.

Neither Slipachenko nor her husband are Jewish, but they seemed well-versed in anti-Semitism in the former Soviet Union, said Jack Kugelmass, executive director of the Toronto office of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS).

Often, Kugelmass said, Russian newcomers arrive with phony documents supporting their claims of being Jewish.

"These documents are very good and can fool people. [But] we know how to recognize them, and we turn [those who use them] away from JIAS sponsorship," Kugelmass said.

Meantime, the two couples Slipachenko helped bring to Canada could face prosecution for making false claims in their bids for asylum, he said.

He said emigres from the former Soviet republics often know they are using phony documents or knowingly rely on unscrupulous immigration consultants abroad, but are willing to take those risks to get into Canada.

Bronfman family focus of court battle

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

One of Canada's most prominent Jewish families was the focus of a court battle last week that pitted the federal government against a lone private citizen.

Revenue Canada (now called the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, or CCRA) faced off in the Federal Court of Appeal against George Harris, a Winnipeg social activist who has contested a loophole that allowed $2 billion in Bronfman family assets to leave Canada tax free.

Harris' case against Ottawa was prompted by a controversial ruling in 1991 by Revenue Canada that permitted the Bronfmans to move more than $2 billion in Seagram Co. stock to the United States, thus allowing the family to escape a tax bill estimated at $700 million.

The CCRA was in court to appeal a ruling last year that allowed Harris' challenge to proceed in the public interest. Federal Court Judge Francis Muldoon ruled that permitting the Bronfmans to escape a huge tax bill smacked of "favouritism." He also lambasted Revenue Canada for its "grave maladministration."

The government argued that the law does not allow one private citizen to challenge the income tax affairs of another. To allow such a challenge is "inconsistent with our system of tax administration," the CCRA said.

Harris, a member of a Winnipeg social advocacy group called CHOICES, has countered that he has as much right to challenge tax treatment of the Bronfmans as he does any other government decision.

His lawsuit claims there is "no substantive difference between a dollar of tax revenue forgone and a dollar of public money expended by government."

Arthur Drache, one of Canada's most pre-eminent tax lawyers, told The CJN that if Harris' challenge is allowed to proceed, it would set a "mind-boggling" precedent.

"The issue is the same if it's billions or a $500 deduction," Drache said from his Ottawa office. "It's private."

He added that it has never been officially confirmed that the Bronfman family is directly involved in the matter.

"It's a great open secret, but to this day, nobody has admitted it's the Bronfmans."

Kiever Shul aims to reinvigorate congregation

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Entering the Kiever Shul with its antique chandelier suspended from the domed ceiling over the central bimah is like stepping back into history. Two lions with gleaming red-jewelled eyes sit on either side of the Tablets atop the polished wood Aron Kodesh with its intricately carved doors.

But few people get to see the restored interior of the First Russian Congregation Rodfe Sholom Anshei Kiev, founded in 1914 and known as the Kiever Shul. The building, completed in 1927, is located at the corner of Denison Square and Bellevue Avenue in the Kensington Market area, once the hub of Jewish life in Toronto.

The shul, like many others in the area, saw its congregation dwindle when Toronto Jews moved north along the Bathurst Street corridor in the '50s. The first Toronto shul to be designated a historical site, the shul sits empty most of the time and is "definitely underutilized because of the changing demographics," says Pinkus.

But Rabbi Gedaliah (Gary) Zweig is planning to change that, he says, by reinvigorating the congregation. Rabbi Zweig and a small group of volunteers are trying to attract more people to the Kiever by organizing community events there. They are holding a Purim party, the shul's first in 15 years, on Monday, March 20, at 6:30 p.m.

The party will include a Ma'ariv service, the Megillah reading, refreshments, prizes for costumes and a live rock band.

Rabbi Zweig, who has led High Holy Day services at the Kiever since 1996, and has and officiated at occasional bar mitzvahs, says he has "made it [his] business to come to the Kiever more often.

"You can build everything in a new shul – a new bimah and a beautiful banquet hall. But there's one thing you can't build in a new shul – and that's history."

Rabbi Zweig says Pinkus and his brother Max are sons of one of the original founders. The Shabbat minyan attracts at least 20 people every week.

"I said to Mr. Pinkus, 'Why don't we just start to do things?' It wasn't just me. A lot of people whom I see at the High Holy Days, we all had the same feeling. It was time to start using the shul more."

Pinkus says he welcomes this increased involvement at the shul. "It's about time. I most definitely think it's a good thing."

Rabbi Zweig says there have been a few bar mitzvahs at the shul in recent years. "People like the venue. They want a smaller place with history. They like it so much they're getting involved with the shul... We're just getting a mailing list of people so that we can do more programs."

He notes that one person sponsored two ads in The CJN advertising the 85th anniversary of the inauguration of the shul last June, and the event drew close to 100 people.

"When we saw the turnout, we decided to plan for other events. Another individual sponsored four ads in The CJN and we had more people at the High Holy Days than ever before.

"Simchat Torah we had a party for about 50 people. In the more recent past, there weren't parties because many of the congregants were too old to organize them. But now there's a group of younger people who want to revitalize the synagogue by having more events there."

Last year's Chanukah party drew almost 100 people of all ages, he adds.

Rabbi Zweig says he works in a family paint business that was founded by his grandfather in the Kensington Market area at about the same time as the shul was constructed. He says he feels a connection to his grandfather through the business, and he feels a strong spiritual connection to him when he attends the services at Kiever Shul.

"It reinforces the connection to earlier generations of the family, and I'm trying to pass that on to my son.We are fortunate to have old shuls like the Kiever. It's important to utilize them. It's gratifying and fulfilling to be a part of shul that has such a long history."

New Price Chopper to serve community

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new Price Chopper supermarket opening at Bathurst and Cedarcroft will focus on serving the needs of the Jewish community.

The grand opening is scheduled for March 21 at 9 a.m.

Previously home to a Miracle Mart, and in more recent years to various discount businesses when not standing vacant, the 18,000-square-foot store will offer kosher baked goods and frozen foods, packaged kosher deli products, and an extensive line of kosher grocery products, according to the public relations office of Sobey's, which now owns Price Chopper.

Plans are under way to offer kosher prepared meals, some large enough for several people.

There will also be large produce and fresh fish departments, as well as health and beauty aids.

The store will be open seven days a week from 8 a.m. until midnight.

The Price Chopper store at Bathurst and Steeles will remain open, but will not focus particularly on the Jewish shopper.

Sobey's, which also owns IGA, plans to hire 90 full- and part-time staff for the new facility.

Imprisoned Iranians not expected to get death penalty

By RON CSILLAG and BEN ROSE
Staff Reporters

TORONTO — The 13 Jews in Iran awaiting trial on charges of spying for Israel, 10 of whom still remain behind bars, won't receive the death penalty and won't get life prison terms, according to a top-level negotiator who has held discussions with Iranian officials on the matter.

Giandomenico Picco, 52, of New York told The CJN in an interview that his assessment is based on the fact that the charges against the 10 will be heard by the regular judicial system of Iran, not by the revolutionary courts, and on the fact that the government recently released three of the accused from jail.

Three detainees released

Earlier this month, Picco briefed the national executive of Canadian Jewish Congress on the plight of the 13 Iranian Jews facing trial, and later addressed a group of community leaders at the Thornhill home of his friend, Walter Arbib, president and CEO of Skylink Inc.

The recent election of reform elements in Iran, with a consequent reshuffling of government posts before the trials begin, is another reason for hope, Picco said. "The answers will be in before the trial begins," he told the executive.

It was through Arbib's connections that CJC was able to persuade Picco last autumn to act as an intermediary in the case and push for the unconditional release of the prisoners.

Giandomenico Picco

A year ago, Iran arrested the 13 Jews on charges of spying "for the Zionist regime," allegations widely believed to be trumped-up. They have been in prison ever since, but are allowed visits from family and lawyers.

Three of the detainees have been released from custody. Recent reports said the accused would receive one-day trials next month, raising fears in the West that their fates are sealed.

But Picco is confident that they will be dealt with on a case-by-case basis, with family-picked lawyers present, and that neither death sentences nor life terms will be meted out.

A former senior United Nations diplomat for 20 years, the Italian-born Picco helped negotiate an end to the war in Afghanistan and between Iran and Iraq. His most dangerous mission took him to Beirut in the early 1980s, when Islamic militants were seizing dozens of hostages. His lone efforts led to the release of several hostages, including former Anglican church envoy Terry Waite and U.S. journalist Terry Anderson.

He is now the personal representative of the UN secretary general for the UN's Year of Dialogue among Civilizations.

The Canadian government has turned to him for briefings on the situation in Iran.

Picco declined to tell The CJN with whom he is dealing in Iran now, except that it is "one step removed" from President Mohammad Khatami.

Picco is chief executive officer of GDS of New York, a consulting firm to corporations seeking joint venture partners. He is author of Man Without a Gun, which tells about his experiences.

Pressure by the Canadian government and others to ensure that the Iranian captives are given a fair trial is very important, the former diplomat and negotiator said.

Moshe Ronen, CJC national president, introduced Picco to the executive as a staunch friend of Jews everywhere, a man whose connection to the Iranian hostage situation is close and important, and praised Arbib for arranging a meeting between Picco and the CJC last fall in New York.

New group aimed at helping immigrant teens

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The new Russian Jewish Initiative Community Organization, formed as a result of the death of teenager Matti Baranovski, is up and running.

About 40 people, mostly women, attended the group's first meeting in December.

One of the founding members, Elena Aleinikov, a Toronto school board principal and a board member of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, has been in Canada since 1975, and raised her daughter in the Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue area.

"The events in November really perturbed the community. A group of us decided to meet with other concerned people. It was time to start doing something," Aleinikov said.

The group that gathered at the first meeting was comprised of people "from different walks of life who have lived here for some time. They feel that they are ready to give back to the community," she said.

Alan Sandler

Their main concern is for the children of newly arrived immigrants, who have no place to go after school and on weekends, she said. "Now that our children are grown, we want to start taking care of other children."

The group feels strongly that the needs of the community are not being met, Aleinikov said. About 600 children of Russian immigrants attend two schools in the area – Northview Heights Secondary School and Fisherville Junior High School – "and that is only two schools. There is a large number of kids who gather in parks and lobbies because they have no place else to go," she said.

She is not asking that Russian teenagers be segregated. "We do want them integrated into the mainstream, but it is difficult for them because they do not speak the language. They live in an environment in which they are not totally accepted. The teen and pre-teen years are a difficult time to integrate with other children."

Focus groups have been conducted at area schools by Russian speaking social workers, said Aleinikov, and they discovered that teens who have been here less than five years want to be with other Russian teens. "We all went through the same process. These kids need a lot of support, and there is little in place to meet their needs. The community needs to know that these kids are here in big numbers."

The issues at hand are important to the entire Russian community, Aleinikov said, "but the women are especially concerned. They are usually the ones who deal with their children's education, social and emotional needs."

Professionals working with new immigrant families agree.

Minerva Hui, executive director of Working Skills Centre, an agency that provides settlement services for immigrant women, said women carry a "huge load in their family's settlement process. Few immigrant men are involved in their kids' education and extra-curricular activities. Mothers see their kids struggling to settle in, and they feel frustrated that they cannot help. They often feel alone and confused."

If Canadian women have a double role, working and taking care of their home, immigrant women carry a "triple load. They need to deal with the special needs of their children," said Hui.

Women tend to be resourceful and creative when it comes to child care, said Mila Voihanski, director of immigrant services for Jewish Immigrant Aid Services. "They are used to looking for solutions and they feel it is their responsibility to look after their family's emotional needs."

Aleinikov said she is encouraged that eight representatives from UJA FEDERATION attended a recent meeting of the Russian community group.

"They seemed happy about this grassroots movement, and they would like us to be involved in the planning. We want to see youth programs and an easier accessibility to facilities by newcomers," she said.

Alan Sandler, president of UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, said the group is dealing with a critical issue and its formation is a very positive step. "They are not asking for anything. They want to be part of the community. The Russian community is a diverse one which requires a wide range of services. There is a huge group of unaffiliated and uninvolved Jews, and they need to be brought into the community.

"Immigrants from western, English-speaking countries take about three years to feel comfortable in Canada, so it is much harder for Russian immigrants.

"In my mind, this is one of the greatest steps forward. This is them coming to us. When an immigrant group comes forward, it shows the maturation of a community," Sandler said.

Perry Romberg, assistant director of planning and allocations at UJA FEDERATION, said that when a small group such as the Russian Jewish Initiative Community Organization comes forward, "it is the essence of good community development. They are saying that it is time that they speak for themselves."

Beth Emeth and Beth David may join forces

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two synagogues have raised the possibility of joining forces to establish an additional site in the Bathurst Street corridor of Thornhill.

Congregants at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue have received letters from their respective presidents informing them of recent preliminary talks.

Both Sheldon Berg of Beth Emeth and Howard Zweig of Beth David emphasized in their letters that neither a synagogue merger nor the establishment of a Thornhill site had been endorsed.

"At this point the only decision which has been made is to gather information and to consider the advantages and disadvantages of such a plan," wrote Zweig. "Partnership with Beth Emeth would allow both congregations to keep a strong presence in our current neighbourhood while carrying out an expansion plan."

Beth David is located between Bathurst Street and Faywood Boulevard, south of Sheppard Avenue West. Beth Emeth, about three kilometres away, is between Bathurst and Wilmington Avenue, Faywood's continuation north of Sheppard.

The two synagogues have had an informal partnership for years, Berg wrote in his letter. In addition to the close working relationship of their respective clergy, he cited the congregations' formal partnership regarding their afternoon Hebrew School.

The possible changes are linked to changing demographics.

In fact, a "significant percentage" of Beth Emeth members live in the Thornhill area, Berg noted in his letter. Likewise at Beth David members, approximately 30 percent of the members live in the Thornhill area.

Despite a booming Jewish population in the area (well over 45,000 in York Region), it's only a little over a year ago that a fledgling Conservative congregation, the Thornhill Conservative Synagogue, was established in Thornhill, to serve the area between Dufferin Street, Steeles Avenue, Yonge Street and Highway 7.

Honour Ruchama by showing sensitivity to others

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The best way to honour someone who has died is to emulate their best qualities, asserts noted writer and speaker Rabbi Paysach Krohn.

In this way, he said, the soul can reach the loftiest heights in heaven.

Rabbi Krohn was speaking at a memorial program for Ruchama Zlotnick, a 15-year-old student at Bais Yaakov High School killed in an automobile accident last March.

Over 1,200 people attended the lecture, held at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill. Proceeds went to Tomchei Shabbos, a volunteer organization that provides food packages to needy families for Shabbat and yom tov.

The lecture was titled Ahavas Yisroel: a Sense of Sensitivity, a quality, Rabbi Krohn said, that was inherent in Zlotnick's short life.

God created mankind, and if one honours the people with whom one comes in contact, then one is honouring God, he said.

Every person, Jew and non-Jew, must be respected, Rabbi Krohn said. Whether the Jew is "your kind of Jew" or not, whether it is the woman behind a counter, a toll taker or a bus driver, and you are a lawyer or accountant. Everyone must be treated with "decency and derech eretz."

Speaking largely in parables, a technique for which he is known, Rabbi Krohn gave examples of praiseworthy behaviour: the famous scholar Rabbi Yaakov Kaminetsky refusing to use an alarm clock because it would waken his neighbour; a bar mitzvah boy insisting on comforting his rebbe who had accidentally taught him the wrong bar mitzvah portion; the 11-year-old boy who learned sign language so he could help a deaf classmate; an elderly rabbi dismissing his family from his hospital room so a young resident wouldn't be embarrassed when doing a difficult procedure.

Don't forget your single friends

Rabbi Krohn urged people to be sensitive to the feelings of the unmarried. "Give a single man an aliyah. Don't forget your single friends when you yourself get married."

And don't just ask them for dinner on Shabbat or yom tov, he said.

If someone you know has marital or personal problems, don't talk about them unless you can help them in a concrete fashion, he said. "Have respect for their dignity."

Don't compound the pain of those who are dealing with serious problems, such as a parent with an autistic child, by excluding them, he said.

He cited as an example a gabbai at a synagogue who appointed a youngster with Down's syndrome as his Shalosh Seudot assistant, with the responsibility of setting the tables, bringing out the food, and cleaning up. The congregation even gave the young man a plaque, thanking him for what he did for the shul.

Rabbi Krohn suggested organizing in Toronto a group called Chaverim, which helps those facing crises, such as babysitting for someone who has to take their own mother to the hospital, or for changing a flat tire.

Ruchama Zlotnick was known for her many acts of kindness towards others, for writing letters of encouragement, for being willing to stand up for her friends. The legacy of her warmth and goodness is what will last forever, Rabbi Krohn told the often emotional crowd.

Ruchama's older brother, Zev, said that she "is still vivid in my mind and my family's. She wouldn't tolerate another's pain."

"May your tears in heaven wash away heaven's harsh decrees (for us)," he said.

The family hopes to make the Ruchama Zlotnick Memorial Lecture an annual event, Zev Zlotnick said.

Cotler, Axworthy discuss situation in Iran

MONTREAL — MP Irwin Cotler, who has been pressing for the release of the Jews imprisoned in Iran for over a year, recently met with Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy to discuss the Iranian election and the fate of Iranian Jews.

Axworthy advised Cotler that he regarded the criminal charges against the 13 Iranian Jews as "completely unfounded," that he has made representations on their plight directly to the Iranian foreign minister, that the Canadian ambassador to Iran has been spearheading the diplomatic group engaged in this issue, and that he will continue the "entreaties" to the newly elected Iranian government.

He added that he hopes the reformist orientation of the new Iranian parliament will "result in the release of the imprisoned Iranian Jews."

Axworthy later repeated in the House of Commons the essence of his remarks to Cotler. After welcoming the electoral results in Iran, he raised concerns about the plight of the persecuted Baha'i community and the imprisoned Jews.

Irwin Cotler

Cotler said the approach of the impending trial date of April 13 for the Iranian Jews makes Axworthy's comments more telling and timely.

Hamilton Negev Dinner to honour local Italians

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Two prominent members of Hamilton's Italian community – a father and son – have been named honorees of Hamilton Jewish National Fund's (JNF) first Negev Tribute Dinner of the new millennium.

Enrico H. Mancinelli and his son, Joseph S. Mancinelli, both Canadian leaders of the Labourers' International Union of North America (LIUNA), were formally introduced to the Negev Dinner 2000 committee at a recent reception at the Royal Connaught Hotel

Both are also longtime supporters of the State of Israel. In 1981, Enrico was presented with the Israel Solidarity Award at a dinner sponsored jointly by Hamilton State of Israel Bonds and the Ontario provincial district council of LIUNA

In an interview at the time, he told The CJN that he grew up in the Jewish district of Rome, the son of a socialist who "landed in jail every time Mussolini made a speech," and who "helped hide Jews during the war."

According to Negev Dinner organizers, the Mancinellis were both chosen for their "outstanding achievements, vision and leadership ... compassion for the plight of their fellow human beings and their challenging initiatives (in) the redevelopment of Hamilton's downtown core."

Enrico came to Canada in 1952 at the age of 27. In 1971, while serving as secretary-treasurer of LIUNA, he established the first pension fund for construction workers in Ontario and is now co-chair of what has become the Labourers' Pension Fund of Central and Eastern Canada.

Joseph is currently international vice-president and regional manager, of Central and Eastern Canada, LIUNA.

Both men have had numerous leading positions within LIUNA, as well as Local 837, serving the Hamilton-Wentworth and Niagara Peninsula area. And both are also leaders in numerous charitable and Italian-Canadian organizations.

With LIUNA's recent acquisition of several downtown properties, the Mancinellis have also become heavily involved in Hamilton's downtown core redevelopment.

The dinner on June 7 will be chaired by Thomas Weisz, with his father, Hamilton business leader and past Negev Dinner honoree Arthur Weisz serving as honorary dinner chair.

The Negev Dinner 2000 committee reception was attended by the new Israel consul general, Meir Romem; Hamilton East MP, Dominic Agostino; and Hamilton West MPP David Christopherson.

Hamilton JNF president, Lawrence Friedman welcomed guests. JNF National vice-president, Dr. Sharon Marcovitz Hart, spoke of the organization's role in the development of Israel.

Ephraim Zussman, JNF Jerusalem emissary for southwestern Ontario outlined the projects chosen by the Mancinellis: the Ofer School for Autistic Children in Haifa, which benefits all Israeli children, Jewish, Muslim and Christian, with "overflow" funds going towards the development of a water reservoir in the Negev.

Coast to Coast

PM steps up, not down

Ever since Moses led the Jews from slavery to freedom, we have known the lonely and tormented lot of political leaders. Thirty-five centuries later, we find that the fate of leaders in the "true North strong and free" is little different from that of Moses of old.

The relentless hounding of the government continues to dominate the media and question period. At first, the charges seemed politically motivated and overblown. Then, revelations from internal documents at Human Resources and Development seemed to confirm that where there's smoke, there's fire. Now, the RCMP is investigating.

Jean Chrétien is a big boy, you will say, and he knows the rough and tumble life of political leaders. True enough, but it is not the Shovelgate scandal, per se, that has the prime minister upset and feeling increasingly isolated.

The recent manoeuvres by the Paul Martin camp coupled with increasingly vocal grumbling from government backbenchers have the prime minister wondering (as Moses probably did) whether this is all worth the aggravation.

On the substance of the HRD scandal, the prime minister's message is clear: Pork-barrel politics has always played a role in Canadian life and to pretend it does not is hypocritical.

No, the PM is exercised at the absence of any kind of "rallying around the leader" that is supposed to occur when the team is under attack. Instead, every special interest group in caucus has tried to take jabs at his perceived vulnerability. The man who delivered two majority governments and on whose coat-tails so many government MPs have ridden, feels a sense of betrayal. Given the importance he attaches to loyalty, it is no wonder. It is also no wonder that he feels hurt.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

And, like all in his predicament, he has lashed out. He has made the Martin resignation tactic look like the pathetic attempts of the desperate. He has virtually commandeered the health portfolio from his other potential rival, Alan Rock. All of this in the lead-up to the Liberal convention where he is expected to definitively declare his intention to stay on as leader.

Once again, the little guy from Shawinigan has been underestimated by his opponents. Under the greatest pressure since he first took office in 1993, he has shown great leadership. Love him or leave him, Chrétien has chosen to step up to the challenge rather than step down. At the end of the day, that is what leadership is all about.

Deadline looms in war crime case

MONTREAL — A Polish native accused of collaboration in the Nazi killings of 4,000 Jews and partisans could be deported if he does not contest the case against him by March 17.

Walter Obodzinski, 80, a resident of the Montreal suburb of St. Léonard, is charged with having withheld information about his activities in a Nazi-led police unit on his Canadian immigration application. He received Canadian citizenship in 1955.

The case was brought against him by Citizenship and Immigration Canada and is being heard in Federal Court in Montreal.

In 1941, Obodzinski joined a Nazi unit in occupied Poland that was responsible for the deaths of 4,000 Jews and partisans and the deportation of 20,000 persons to labour camps, according to documents filed in court Feb. 1.

In 1944, Obodzinski was transferred to France, where he deserted the Nazis to join the French resistance, the 14-page document also shows. Soon after that, he joined a Polish unit under British command.

His lawyer, Johanne Doyon, originally had until March 2 to gather evidence in defence of Obodzinski. The Federal Court then granted a 15-day delay of proceedings.

If Obodzinski does not respond by then, a default judgment could be obtained, provided that a judge finds the government's evidence is sufficient.

The immigration minister would then have to ask the federal cabinet to repeal Obodzinski's citizenship, which would set in motion deportation procedures.

Doyon has the right to request another extension on March 17.

על הזקי ואנושיות

על כדורגל ונשים

"לפני כמה חודשים חטפה נבחרת הכדורגל של ישראל מנבחרת דנמרק כישלון בעובי המוביל הארצי. עד לדקה החמישית היו כל הפרופסורים למדעי הכדורגל בישראל בטוחים שהדנים לא יהיו משוכה גבוהה עבור אחד עשר המופלאים של הכדורגל הישראלי. אחרי תשעים דקות וחמישה מטחי כבוד דניים, ירד אבל כבד על ארץ הקודש. למחרת התברר שלילה לפני המפגש על הדשא ברמת גן, נערך משחק מוקדם בחדרי מלון תל אביבי ידוע בין מספר כוכבי נבחרת הקבוצת נערות לווי מהליגה העילית של המקצוע העתיק בעולם. איך שהוא הגיעו ידיעות על ה-פור פליי הזה

Festival of art, song & film showcases local talent

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — White light shines on a colour photograph of an elegant menorah. Almost harsh in its intensity, the bright light is a sharp contrast to the subtle, yellow glow emitted from the menorah candles.

"I tried to make it a warm image to try to bring out the light, the warmth of the holiday," says Ronen Itzkovitch, 21, a second-year student at Seneca College of Applied Arts and Technology.

Itzkovitch's photograph, Eternal Lights, was on display Sunday March 5 at the Poor Alex Theatre. The art exhibition was the first event of Colouring Ourselves: A Festival of Jewish Creativity.

The visual art on display included charcoal-on-newsprint sketches, a water-colour painting, acrylic paintings on canvas and thread and Japanese paper hangings.

The message of the festival is "creativity, art, literature, music, song, and film are alive and thriving within the young Jewish community of Toronto," said Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

Kaye was speaking in the gallery at the opening ceremonies of the four-day festival which showcased the talent of students and recent graduates, mainly from Toronto.

The festival, which won an award last year for originality and innovation from Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, included a film night, music night and theatre, dance and spoken word night.

This year, it was organized by 24 students and recent graduates, including Tamar Kagan, arts and culture co-ordinator for Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, who ran the festival.

Kagan tried to involve students and graduates in organizing the festival instead of just participating in it.

"My goal was to foster leadership by empowering students," she said.

Limore Twena, a 23-year-old York University student, worked with a team of three people to organize the festival's music night, which included a jazz band, solo guitar acts and a rendition of songs from Fiddler on The Roof.

Arts are alive and thriving

"Tamar gave each of us ownership of our night and it got us really motivated," she said.

Ellie Richmond, 22, who designed the festival's logo, was one of a team of four people that organized the art gallery.

The group began working back in late September/early October and was responsible for a multitude of tasks, including collecting approximately 90 submissions and choosing the 50 which would be displayed, contacting artists, and even painting the black flats used to display the artwork.

"That was exciting – seeing it start way back last year and then watching it come to life," she said.

On the wall, in one corner of the gallery, fiery reds turn into more subdued shades of green, blue, brown and black. A black woman with wild hair and downcast eyes has a distinct look of defeat and shame.

"She looks sickly," admits Rachel Weinstock, the second-year York University fine arts student who created the painting.

Weinstock has been collecting images since the early '80s – from photographs in magazines to her own drawings – with the intent of using them as inspiration for one of her own paintings.

Last summer, she spotted a photograph of a group of girls, each in their own pose, standing together in an old magazine from the '60s.

She was drawn to the image of one girl – a beautiful black woman.

In the original photo, the woman has a fuller figure than in Weinstock's painting where her body is elongated.

Weinstock often creates paintings with a feminist theme and says this untitled painting touches on the themes of slavery and anorexia.

"It was a moving photograph but I pushed it further – I took it to a more emotional level," she said.

As Weinstock explains, the young woman aspires to be free but is restrained by her own insecurities.

"Just looking at this painting, you know that she wants to be more, but she is ashamed," she said.

Weinstock experimented with both colour and texture, starting with a red canvas and using shades of yellow and green on top.

The festival was about more than just art. It was about something much bigger, says Kagan.

"It's about working as a collective to put something magical together – something more than one person could do on their own."

Recalling Purim in Iraq

By LINDA MOREL
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Like visions of date palms laden with fruit, Purim in Iraq was paradise for children.

"We were excused from school, and over the course of the holiday, we'd attend six parties," says Nora Iny, who grew up in Baghdad in the 1960s.

She is now a trustee of Congregation Bene Naharayim, an Iraqi synagogue in Jamaica Estates, N.Y.

Looking back, she recalls the spectacular dinners and lunches people threw for their extended families and friends.

"We had guests in the house all the time," says Jamila Shooker, a Manhattan resident who left her homeland in 1946 after witnessing attacks on Jews. Yet, she has vivid memories of aunts and uncles lavishing children with gifts.

Even more than during Chanukah, which in Iraq never hit the commercial heights it has reached here, at Purim children received gifts such as pieces of silver jewelry or coins.

Iny describes her parents and grandparents going to the bank to get two or three new riyals per child, coins worth about 50 cents each.

To escape Saddam Hussein's tyranny, in 1974, she and her family were in the last wave of Jews to flee the country. Although a Jewish culture once flourished there, today only about 100 Jews live in Iraq.

From the heartland of the Sephardi world, for centuries, Iraqis repeated the story of Queen Esther, the brave young beauty who saved her people from annihilation at the hands of wicked Haman.

Although Purim was a spirited occasion, people didn't use noisemakers or stamp their feet at the mention of Haman's name.

"Even in good times, we didn't dress in costumes as children do here," says Iny. "We wouldn't parade or call attention to ourselves. We were afraid to show we were Jews."

Playing cards was the major entertainment at parties, and people often gambled for small change.

"I hated cards and would quit after 15 minutes, claiming I was tired," Iny says with a laugh. Her fondest memories of Purim revolve around food.

While Ashkenazi Jews adore hamantaschen, the Iraqi signature dish is sambusk el tawa, explains Carole Basri, an attorney of Iraqi descent who teaches cooking classes through Sephardic House in Manhattan.

"Sambusk are small pastry crescents filled with chicken and vegetables."

Fabulous as appetizers, they can also be served as the main course. The pastry is el tawa, meaning fried.

"My mother made this dish every Purim," says Iny, explaining how her mother started cooking two days in advance, stopping only when several platters were piled high with crescents. "My sisters and I would eat them by the dozen, never tiring of the taste."

Today vegetarians skip the chicken, substituting chickpeas and cumin instead. This hearkens back to Queen Esther, who some scholars believe became a vegetarian after marrying the King of Persia.

Fearful of revealing her religion at the palace, but determined to remain kosher, Esther was wary of the ingredients in the food she ate. Because pareve foods were her safest alternatives, there is evidence that she delighted in chickpeas.

Beets and turnips graced Iraqi Purim tables, too.

"Simply slice and boil them, then sprinkle with salt," says Shooker. "They're delicious!"

From a country where date palms were plentiful, people often topped these root vegetables with date syrup made from straining simmered dates through cheesecloth.

Like Jews the world over, Iraqis also visited friends at Purim, bringing sweets to their hosts.

The number of desserts was incredible, claims Iny, describing phyllo-rolled almond cookies and baklava filled with pistachios, sugar and cardamom. Her favourite is zangula, donuts prepared by drizzling dough into hot oil.

After frying zangula, Basri teaches students to dip them in a syrup of sugar, lemon and rosewater, a distillation of rose petals with an intensely perfumed flavour that's been popular for centuries in the Middle East.

No Purim celebration in Iraq was complete without plenty of extra food for all the friends expected to stop by.

"The warmth in the Jewish community was incredible," says Shooker, who has been in exile for five decades, but still misses the sweetest part of life in Baghdad – Purim parties, family and friends.

Recipes by Carole Basri:

SAMBUSK EL TAWA

Dough
4 cups flour
¼ tsp. salt
2 pkg. dry yeast
1½ cups warm water
1 tbsp. olive oil

Combine flour and salt. In another bowl, dissolve yeast in water for about five minutes, until proofed (foamy). Add to flour. Slowly add additional warm water to form a sticky dough. Remove dough to a floured counter and knead until smooth. Coat a large bowl with oil and place dough inside. Cover with plastic wrap until dough doubles in size, about 45-60 minutes. Prepare chicken filling.

Chicken Filling
1 large onion, diced
1 tbsp. olive oil
4 lb. cooked, diced chicken
½ cup frozen peas
Salt and pepper to taste
2 cups corn oil

Saute onion in olive oil until translucent, about 3 minutes. Add chicken, peas, salt and pepper. Cool. Place dough on floured counter. Roll dough ⅛ inch thick. With a 3-inch round cookie cutter, cut circles of dough and place on an oiled cookie sheet. Place 1 tbsp. of filling on each circle. Fold in half and seal tightly by pressing edges together.

Purim Food Ideas

Safta Margalit's ma'amul and ma'arud

By GALILA TURKIENICZ
Special to The CJN

These recipes come from Safed, Israel, and were prepared especially for Purim.

In 1492, many of the descendants of the Jews expelled from Spain settled in countries around the Mediterranean. Some migrated to Safed, the capital of the Upper Galilee, bringing their own traditions and tastes.

As Jews from eastern Europe likewise began to put down roots in Safed, "mixed marriages" (Ashkenazi-Sephardi) often resulted, and a culinary tradition emerged that was unique to the area.

Around Purim, much to the delight of the children growing up, aromas from the baking of the following pastries spread into every narrow alley and home as part of the holiday tradition.

MA'AMUL AND MA'ARUD

Dough
8 cups flour
1 cup farina (cream of wheat or semolina)
¼ cup oil
16 ounces margarine
1½ cup rosewater
3 tbsp. baking powder

Melt margarine and add the rest of the ingredients. Blend well in a mixer. Divide dough into 12 balls (6 for ma'arud, 6 for ma'amul).

Take one ball at a time, and roll out on a lightly floured surface to about ⅛ of an inch. Makes about 30 to 40 of each type of pastry.

MA'ARUD

Filling
2 packages pitted dates
1 tsp. water
1 tbsp. oil
Pinch of cinnamon
Pinch of ginger

Cook above ingredients on low heat until smooth, stirring often (about 10 minutes).

Preparation

Spread the filling on each of the 6 rolled-out pieces of dough. Roll up to form a cigar – like a strudel. Make slits on top with a knife. Place in baking pan.

Bake at 350 in preheated oven for 20 minutes. Remove from oven. Cut the strudel-like logs into 1 to 1½-inch pieces in diamond shapes. Space pieces out on baking pan and put back into oven for 10 more minutes, or until golden brown.

Remove from oven. Sprinkle with powdered sugar.

MA'AMUL

Use the 6 balls of dough put aside.

Filling
2 lb. walnuts
¼ cup sugar (or to taste)
1 tsp. cinnamon
2 tsp. rosewater (available at Indian, Middle Eastern and some kosher stores)

Preparation

The authentic way

Step 1. Cut pieces of dough into the size of a walnut. Flatten pieces in the palm of your hand until thin. Half-close the palm of your hand to form a well in the pastry. Fill with 1 tbsp. of the filling.

Step 2. Draw up the 3 sides to the centre to form a triangle. Prick the top with a fork. Place cookies in baking pan and bake at 350 for 25 to 30 minutes. Remove from oven and sprinkle with powdered sugar.

A faster way

Roll out one ball at a time until it is very thin. Cut into 3½ or 4-inch circles with a drinking glass dipped into flour. Place 1 tbsp. of filling on the centre of each round. Continue with Step 2 as above.

Heat corn oil in a deep skillet to 375. Fry a few pieces at a time until golden brown. Drain on paper towels. Yield: 30 crescents

ZANGULA

Dough
1½ cups flour
¼ tsp. salt
2 pkg. dry yeast
1¼ cups warm water
2 cups corn oil
Plastic squirt bottle

Combine flour and salt. In another bowl, dissolve yeast in ½ cup warm water for about five minutes, until proofed (foamy). Add to flour. Slowly add remaining water to form a creamy, sticky dough. Coat a large bowl with 1 tbsp. oil. Cover with plastic wrap for 30 minutes. Prepare syrup.

Syrup
1 cup sugar
¾ cup water
juice of ½ lemon
1 tbsp. rosewater (sold at Indian, Middle Eastern and some kosher stores)

Combine sugar and water in a saucepan. At medium heat, stir until sugar dissolves and mixture thickens. Add lemon juice and rosewater, cooking one minute. Cool. Place dough into squirt bottle. In a large frying pan, heat remaining oil to 400 degrees. Squeeze dough into oil in circles and swirls. Turning once, fry until both sides are golden brown. Remove to paper towels. When cool enough to handle, dip into syrup and serve. Yield: 14-16.

Purim in Iran

By SHAHNAZ KEYPOUR
Special to The CJN

According to Megillat Esther the events related to the festival of Purim took place under King Achashverosh in Shoshan Habira. This city was known in ancient Persian history as Shoosh and corresponds to the present day city of Hamadan in north-central Iran.

The summer residence of the kings of the Hachamaneshid Dynasty, Hamadan still remains a summer holiday destination for Iranians.

Iranian Jews are particularly fond of Hamadan because it has always been one of the main Jewish centres. There are several old synagogues and schools, and an ancient shrine, believed to contain the tombs of Esther and Mordechai, is also in the vicinity.

Even when I was a child, it was still a tradition among Jews to make a neder (vow) to visit a shrine and perform religious rituals there. Families would travel to Hamadan, staying with relatives or friends for a few weeks. On one day, they would set out with loads of food, first to make a "pilgrimage" to the shrine, and then to spend the rest of the day picnicking.

The shrine is a relatively small, square-shaped, domed construction with the tombs in its centre. It is believed that no matter how many people crowd inside, there will always be space for everyone.

In Iranian history, Achashverosh, known as Chashayar Shah, was the grandson of King Cyrus the Great. Known as Koorosh, Cyrus had conquered Babylonia (present-day Iraq) two generations earlier, granting his newly acquired Jewish subjects permission to return to their homeland and rebuild the Temple.

To this day, Iranian Jews remember Achemenid kings with gratitude because of the tolerance and prosperity they enjoyed under their rule. Many Jews name their children after those kings. Until 20 years ago, there were Jewish schools, youth clubs and soccer teams that bore the names Cyrus or Koorosh. Strangely enough, even though there is no trace of the Purim story in ancient Iranian history, Hooman, a variation of Haman is a common male name among Muslim Iranians.

Jewish history records the great majority of the exiles preferred to stay where they were. Esther and Mordechai were descendants of those Jews who chose to remain in Babylonia.

From there they spread farther east throughout the Persian Empire, which accounts for the very large number of Jews found in modern Iraq until 1950, and in Iran as late as the 1980s. Even now, despite massive departures in the last 20 years, an estimated 15,000 to 20,000 Jews still live in Iran, the largest Jewish community in a Muslim country.

Many exiles chose to stay in ancient Iran, because of the country's high level of civilization and material affluence.

The holiday of Purim usually coincides with the Persian New Year, called No rooz, a festival which dates back to the Hachamaneshid Dynasty. This holiday has some similarities to Purim, one of which is the association with number 13 as an unlucky number. The Megillah tells us that when Haman drew lots, he picked number 13. He therefore decided to get rid of the Jews on Adar 13. Similarly, on the 13th day after No rooz, Iranian families leave their homes to go on a picnic, to get rid of bad luck in the coming year.

It is customary to masquerade à few days before No rooz. Troubadours, called Hadju Firuz, disguise themselves with makeup. They parade through the streets, singing, dancing and playing tambourines, to spread good cheer.

We start the holiday of Purim with the Fast of Esther. I recall from my childhood in Iran that after the fast day, the fun would begin. On Purim day, the aroma of Persian halvah filled the air. We sent mishloach manot which we called Purimi. On each tray, my mother would arrange a platter of halvah made with wheat flour, a platter of halvah made with rice flour, a bowl of hard-boiled eggs cooked slowly for a few hours in saffron, fresh bread and an assortment of fresh herbs and fresh fruits of the season.

For the Purim seudah, members of my family usually came for an elaborate dinner. Rice and fresh herb stew, and rice with fresh herbs and white fish were among the dishes on the menu. These were dishes Iranians ate to mark No rooz.

These dishes were followed by the two different kinds of halvah, fresh fruit of the season and different types of nuts. And of course, there was the ever-present samovar, for preparing the tea. After dinner, the adults played cards and backgammon (shesh besh), while the children made effigies of Haman out of old clothes, hoisted them on stakes and burned them, amid jokes and laughter.

At this time, I would like to wish you all a happy Purim. For those Iranian Jews who still remain imprisoned in Shiraz on false accusations, may this holiday see the miracle of their release, as it happened to the Jews in Ancient Persia long ago.

Jews frustrated by vague Papal message

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The papal request for forgiveness published last Sunday has been met with criticism and disappointment from Jewish and Israeli quarters, for its failure to make specific mention of the Holocaust or the sins of the Church as an organized body – it referred only to the guilt of "Christians" – and for avoiding any mention of the historical connection between Christian anti-Semitism and the Holocaust.

Pope John Paul II asked for God's forgiveness for the sins of Roman Catholics over the ages, including those against Jews, women and minorities, in a Day of Pardon Mass at St. Peter's Basilica in the Vatican.

Although the Pope did allude to the Inquisition, there was no specific mention of it or other major historical events such the Crusades or the Holocaust, in which the Church can be said to have played at least a passive role in oppressing Jews.

Prof. Shevach Weiss, the chair of the international council of the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial and himself a Holocaust survivor, told Ha'aretz that "in general, it was a very important speech. It's certainly a great advance toward what needs to be done – both the ceremony itself and the use of the seven-branched candelabra. And it's definitely a clear antithesis to the approach of Pope Pius XII [who was pope during the Holocaust and who ignored the destruction of the Jews].

"Nevertheless, I expected that it would be a far more focused speech in regard to the Holocaust. The present Pope is a Polish native, and as a youth, he witnessed the horrors. He knows what happened, and he knows that we know that he knows."

Yet Weiss also expressed the hope that the Pope would touch on the Holocaust more specifically when he tours Yad Vashem during his visit to Israel.

Minister for Diaspora Affairs, MK Rabbi Michael Melchior, refused to respond to the Pope's declarations, although a government source who deals with the issue said there was great disappointment at the government level over the formulation of the Pope's statements. Nevertheless, it was decided not to officially respond to the statements, in order not to cast a pall over the upcoming papal visit.

Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau

Outside of the government, Jewish leaders were not so reticent about voicing their distress.

Israel's Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau issued a statement expressing his disappointment, saying that he was "deeply frustrated" at the Pope's failure to mention the Holocaust by name.

"To mention the Inquisition from the year 1492 and to exclude the Wannsee Conference from 1942 [at which the destruction of European Jewry was planned] demonstrates a severely warped view of history," the statement said, though Rabbi Lau added, "I hope deeply that the Pope... whom I appreciate very much for his doings and for his condemning anti-Semitism, will complete the asking of forgiveness next week in Yad Vashem."

In response to Sunday's declaration, retired ambassador Dr. Joel Barromi, who is a member of the Yad Vashem administration, called the acknowledgment of sins against all nations as "impressive." But he expressed doubt that it would give full satisfaction to Jews or fill the voids left by previous declarations.

Analysis

The Iranian factor

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Jerusalem is waiting for Syrian President Hafez al-Assad's reply to a proposal for renewing the Israeli-Syrian talks that was transmitted by Prime Minister Ehud Barak via the United States.

If a positive answer is received, Washington will lose no time in convening the sides. The Americans said that if the talks are resumed, it would be better if the delegations were smaller this time, and Barak intends to act on that advice.

The dispute is primarily focused on the demarcation of the June 4, 1967, lines and on the early-warning station on Mount Hermon.

Following the failure of the Shepherdstown talks, the Syrians dug in even more deeply. They are now demanding that Barak submit his position regarding the June 4 lines in writing, and they object to any Israeli presence on Mount Hermon.

The Americans have proposed that each side submit its positions to them as a kind of pledge, and they will formulate a bridging proposal.

In the past, the Syrians also tried to extract from the Americans in written form the pledge that Yitzhak Rabin gave them regarding the border. Syrian ambassador to Washington, Walid Muãlem, put this request to peace envoy Dennis Ross. Rabin, who was furious when he heard about it, blocked any such move.

The Syrians have adopted an old negotiating tactic with which Israel should be familiar. First they demand, as a prior condition, that the Israeli side make a concession on a substantive issue – in this case, the June 4 lines as they define them. Otherwise, they threaten, there will be no negotiations on the other issues.

A different Damascus ploy is to push another important subject, such as the early-warning station on Mount Hermon, to the end of the talks. Instead of looking for a compromise, the issue is left to the end, and then the mediators express amazement – only to the Israeli side, of course – that peace is going to slip through their hands because of this one matter. So it is important to decide on the Mount Hermon question in the initial stages of the talks.

Regarding the June 4 lines, the proposal-demand that Israel put to the Americans is that Lake Kinneret remain totally under Israeli sovereignty and that the borderline pass 500 to 800 metres eastward of it. As for the Mount Hermon station, Israel is willing to compromise and return the site in eight years.

The Americans understand that Barak needs these two elements for the referendum he has promised. They will undoubtedly try to persuade the Syrians to agree to the creation of a certain strip east of Lake Kinneret in Israeli territory and to an Israeli presence on Mount Hermon, at least during the withdrawal period (about three years).

There is one subject however, which is relatively new, that does not seem to be getting the attention it merits: the Iranian military deployment in Lebanon. The long-range rockets Iran sent to Lebanon, which are being stored there by Iranian personnel, constitute a very serious development. It is not comparable to a missile that can be fired from Iran to Iraq, Saudi Arabia or even Israel. The rockets in Lebanon, which have a range of about 70 kilometres, were brought there with the explicit purpose of threatening Israel.

For Israel, this is a military issue that has strategic importance if peace ensues, and certainly in the case of a confrontation. It is far more important than the location of some outpost on the border.

Israel should make the question of the long-range rockets a prior condition in the negotiations with Syria and Lebanon. Damascus cannot shirk this issue, nor, certainly, can the government of Lebanon, with its self-righteous behaviour. And the United States should make the resolution of the issue one of the conditions for a rapprochement with Iran.

Canadian executives charged with grand larceny

NEW YORK — A pair of Canadian businessmen, including a prominent community philanthropist, spent last week in a U.S. jail after being indicted on grand larceny and fraud charges.

Jacques Benquesus, 51, who also goes by the name of Jack Banks, and Larry Weltman, 37, were arrested in New York on allegations they stole $32 million (US) from the New York office of Coutts & Co., a subsidiary of National Westminster Bank PLC. The prosecution alleges they stole the money by artificially inflating the stock of their Internet gaming company, GalaxiWorld.com Ltd in 1995, when it was known as Laser Friendly Inc.

Benquesus and Weltman, who live in Toronto, were arrested in New York after leaving court, where they were defending against a class action civil suit arising from Galaxi World's attempts to set up an Internet gaming business.

Judge Bernard Fried of New York Supreme Court, citing concerns the men might not return for trial, set bail for Benquesus at $35 million and $3 million for Weltman. Court was told that Banks has homes in Toronto, Gibraltar, Israel and Florida.

The pair spent the week in Riker's Island jail as their lawyers attempted to convince the court to reduce bail. At midweek, a deal appeared to be within reach. The court was prepared to reduce Benquesus' bail to $5 million and Weltman's to $500,000 if they agreed to sign waivers agreeing they would not contest a U.S. extradition request. That deal fell through when the court was told Canada would not recognize or enforce waivers signed in the United States.

Susan Kellman, lawyer for Benquesus, asked the court to release the pair from jail and place them under house arrest in New York's Orthodox Jewish community until bail was posted. Court was told Benquesus was willing to post two of his properties in Florida and Weltman offered to pledge his home in Thornhill, Ont. Judge Fried turned down the request.

Court says settlements cannot ban Arabs

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — In a landmark decision, Israel's High Court of Justice has prohibited the state from discriminating against citizens by allocating land for the exclusive use of Jews or other groups.

The ruling came in response to a petition filed on behalf of an Israeli-Arab couple whose application to live in the northern settlement of Katzir had been refused because they are Arab.

Sallai Meridor

In its decision last week, the court ruled 4-1 that as a Jewish, democratic state, Israel could not promote policy that discriminates against any of its citizens based on their religion or nationality.

"This is perhaps the most important ruling the high court has made in the past 50 years regarding equality for citizens," said attorney Dan Yakir of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, which filed the petition.

The settlement was established on state land in 1982 by the Jewish Agency for Israel in co-operation with the Katzir Co-operative Society, which accepts only Jewish members.

The chair of the Jewish Agency, Sallai Meridor, said in the wake of the court decision that the agency is "for equal rights for Arabs and we feel that an effort must be made to allocate land for this sector in order to substantially improve their quality of life."

At the same time, he noted that there are three areas in Israel with high Arab populations – the Triangle in northern Israel, the Negev and the Galilee – and that the government should hold "urgent talks to ensure a Jewish hold on these areas."

In a statement, Meridor warned that "especially during this period, when an independent Palestinian entity is being formed, a real danger arises for the future of the Triangle, the Galilee and the Negev as integral parts of the State of Israel."

The high court's ruling "did not relate," the statement said, "to the reality that in the Triangle it is the Jews who are in fact the minority." As a result a situation could arise "which would discriminate negatively against Jews."

The legal battle began more than four years ago, after Adel and Iman Ka'adan, of the Arab village of Baqa al-Garbiyeh, were told they could not purchase land and build a home in the community of Katzir, near Hadera, because the land was earmarked for Jews alone.

Iman Ka'adan, a schoolteacher, said she and her husband, a hospital worker, had hoped to improve the standard of living for themselves and their three daughters.

"The situation in Baqa al-Garbiyeh is intolerable," she told Israel Radio. "There is no infrastructure, sewage flows in the streets."

In Katzir, she added, "they have air conditioning, new facilities, and every possible advancement."

Perhaps court's most important ruling

Meanwhile, right-wing legislators have vowed to initiate legislation to circumvent the ruling.

"I am convinced that most of the nation will open its eyes and stop and say, 'We are crazy, destroying ourselves with our own hands,'" said Zvi Hendel, a member of the right wing National Unity Party.

Arab Israeli legislators hailed the decision as a breakthrough. "There will no longer be a division of settlements based on being Jewish," said Taleb a-Sana'a of the United Arab List.

Knesset speaker Avraham Burg, a former chair of the Jewish Agency, welcomed the ruling.

Burg said the agency should not be put in the position of holding lands for Jewish use only.

"In general, I think that the State of Israel does not do enough for providing equal opportunity in the Arab sector," he said, adding that as a result of the ruling, "we will find ourselves in a slightly better position socially."

Yad Vashem opens new archives, library

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — New information about the Belzec extermination camp, from which only one Jew survived, is now available to researchers for the first time.

With the opening of the new Archives and Library building at Yad Vashem on March 7, 2000, this information, as well as other material related to the Holocaust, can now be accessed by all.

The new building houses the largest collection of Holocaust material in the world, with 80,000 books, over 55 million pages of documentation in 40 languages, and more than 130,000 photographs.

Largest collection of Holocaust material in the world

The collection includes personal testimonies, Nazi documentation, records of Nazi war criminal trials, and diaries and memoirs of survivors and Nazis.

Among the documentation are testimonials from the KGB archives in Ukraine, the Jerusalem institute revealed during the dedication of the building.

The KGB material consists mainly of files on Russian soldiers captured by the Germans over the course of World War II, who subsequently volunteered to serve as guards at the extermination camps.

After the war, many of them returned to the Soviet Union, where they were interrogated and charged with collaborating with the Nazis. Some of them were executed.

Until now, researchers have been unable to get their hands on these files. Now this material, which provides details on Sobibor, Belzec, and Treblinka extermination camps, can be accessed. The material regarding the Belzec camp is especially important as very little is known about the camp.

"Yad Vashem is important for the education of generations to come," said President Ezer Weizman at the opening ceremony held at the Holocaust museum.

Because of the unexpected wind and rain outside, the ceremony, which was supposed to be held outdoors, was held in a small makeshift conference room.

Among those in attendance were Weizman, Rabbi Israel Miller, president of the Claims Conference, Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau, Chairman of the Yad Vashem Council Prof. Shevah Weiss and Finance Minister Avraham Shohat.

"On behalf of all the Jews in the world, Yad Vashem has gathered everything that has been published on the Holocaust," said Avner Shalev, Chairman of the Yad Vashem directorate. "Whoever needs information can access it through technology, people no longer have to come to [Jerusalem's] Mount of Remembrance to get it.

"The establishment of this major repository of knowledge is of great importance to the Jewish people – in Israel and the Diaspora – and all humanity," Prime Minister Ehud Barak said in a statement.

"It is only through knowledge of the past and learning from its lessons that nations and people can move forward to shape a more civilized and humanitarian future."

Referring to the work done by Weiss and Shohat, who both lost relatives in the Holocaust, and who helped gather information for the archives, Weizman said: "I thank you and say, 'Continue with your holy work.'"

Nutrition plays big role in breast cancer prevention

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Living a life of prevention is a lot easier than living a life of treatment, say interns at the Naturopathic College Clinic.

"Especially with regards to breast cancer, prevention is definitely the buzz word," Jill Kelner and Jen Green told a recent meeting of National Council of Jewish Women.

Naturopaths, who rely on conventional diagnoses, use natural substances to promote the healing ability of the body. They use such therapies as nutritional counselling, botanical medicine and lifestyle counselling in their practice.

Green says that fibre, which bonds and removes estrogen from the body, plays an integral part in breast cancer prevention. It also prevents constipation and stabilizes fluctuating blood sugar, both of which can be breast cancer risks. Women who eat high fibre diets, have a 30 percent lower risk of breast cancer, she says.

She suggests that women aim for 30 grams of fibre daily, which could include one serving of high fibre cereal, one cup of cooked beans, two pieces of whole grain bread or six servings of fruits and vegetables. "We also recommend including two to four tablespoons of ground flax seed in the diet – it is our natural tamoxifen – and using wheat bran."

All hydrogenated, partially hydrogenated and saturated fats should be avoided, she says. "Essential fatty acids, however, which protect cells from free radicals and encourage hormonal function, are important. "They also carry toxins out of the body.

Omega 3 fatty acids are present in flaxseed oil and freshwater fish such as salmon, haddock, trout, sardines, herring and cod. "Balance between omega 3 and omega 6 fatty acids, found in safflower, sesame, peanut, corn and soya oil, at a ratio of 2:1," she says.

She recommends two tablespoons of flaxseed oil daily. "It cannot be heated, so use it in salads, hummus, or shakes. The nutty flavour may take a few tries to get used to it, but it is good," says Green.

Vegetables should be eaten raw, she says, and if that is not possible, steam, stir fry or microwave in that order of preference. "We all struggle with various issues, but we do the best we can. It is better to microwave vegetables, for instance, than not eat them at all."

Phytoestrogens, present in products such as soy bean flour, tofu, miso, sprouts, chick-peas, mung beans, broccoli, sunflower seeds, carrots, garlic and green tea, work by decreasing the estrogen load in the body, so breast cancer is inhibited, says Kelner.

She suggests using glass containers wherever possible, "and never, never, never using plastic in the microwave. Xenoestrogens, which can promote breast cancer, are present in plastic, pesticides, dry cleaning agents and solvents. They are released when the plastic is heated," says Kelner.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am trying to lose weight, but I find that I am always starving when I diet, especially between lunch and dinner. Lately I have been choosing either a bagel and salad, with the dressing on the side, or a bagel and soup for lunch. Is this a poor choice?

A. The choices that you are making are typical of those that many people make when they attempt to diet. You could be making better choices that would be more nutritious and prevent you from experiencing those hunger pangs mid-afternoon. It is very important to try to include protein at all meals, particularly lunch. Protein is found in dairy products, meat, fish, poultry, eggs and soy products.

As well, if you are going to have some bread you are better off choosing whole wheat, rye or pumpernickel. These varieties will keep you feeling full longer and also give you some fibre.

Try a turkey sandwich on whole wheat with mustard and veggies, with a salad (light dressing on the side) or soup, and a piece of fruit. Or try an egg white omelet with wheat toast and a fruit salad, or a salad with a sliced grilled chicken breast and a piece of fruit.

Most people need a mid-afternoon snack. Again, try something that is protein-rich, like yogurt, a piece of fruit and a glass of milk, a few nuts, or some low-fat cheese and whole-wheat crackers.

Q. How do I know which are the healthiest juices to give my children. All juice labels now seem to boast an impressive array of vitamins?

A. The most important thing to look at is the list of ingredients. Look for a natural juice where the actual fruit juice is the first ingredient.

Many ingredient lists begin with water or some type of sugar as the first ingredients. The sugars may be called glucose, fructose or sucrose. In these cases, you are paying a lot of money for flavoured sugar water. You may also want to consider the new orange juices that contain added calcium. This is an excellent way to get both vitamin C and calcium into your children's diets. Most of these juices are pure and therefore, nutritious.

Controversial film Kadosh tries to be realistic, honest

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Amos Gitai, in Kadosh, plumbs the depths of haredi society in Mea Shearim, the cloistered, ghetto-like neighbourhood in Jerusalem which stands as a resolute fortress against secularization and modernism.

Gitai, whose Israeli film opens on March 17 at Canada Square, can go only so far in examining this closed, somewhat impenetrable community. But his attempt carries the hallmarks of authenticity.

Dark and sombre, Kadosh turns on the lives of two sisters, Rifka and Malka, whose respective situations, Gitai claims, are emblematic of the status of women in Mea Shearim.

Rifka (Yael Abecassis), the dutiful wife of a rabbinical scholar, is barren. After 10 years of marriage, she still cannot bear children. Meir (Yoram Hattab), Rivka's pious husband, professes to love and respect her. But on the advice of his rebbe (Yussef Abu Warda), who claims that sterilty is a curse, he decides to leave Rifka and seek out another woman.

Malka (Meital Barda), by contrast, is a rebel. She defies her parents by dating a man who has left the haredi fold and adopted a secular lifestyle. Being headstrong, she initially resists the idea of marrying Yossef (Uri Ran Klauzner), a scholar cut from the same template as Meir. But bowing to parental pressure, she succumbs to their wishes.

On the eve of their wedding night, Yossef fervently prays for children from their union, but Malka sinks into a depression. She seems unreconciled to the circumscribed role she will be expected to play in the marriage and in the community. And she yearns to discover and experience the world beyond Mea Shearim.

In her quest for true love and personal satisfaction, Malka places herself at odds with a culture which demands conformity and sacrifice.

In exploring these palpable tensions, Gitai comes down on the side of Malka. And, in the case of Rivka and Meir, he clearly demonstrates an empathy for women's rights rather than religious law.

Yet Kadosh is not anti-religious. In the opening scene, which sets the tone of this soulful movie, the camera pans respectfully on Meir as he prays and lays tfillin while Rivka is peacefully asleep.

That being said, Gitai paints an unsympathetic portrait of both Meir's rebbe (who, in an unusual but sound casting decision, is portrayed by an Israeli Arab actor) and of Yossef.

The rebbe is depicted as an unfeeling person ready to jettison a fine woman like Rivka at the drop of a hat, while Yossef comes across as a religious fanatic and an incredibly coarse lover.

Distinguished by stellar acting, Kadosh is a sensitive film which pays minute attention to telling details, from Meir's methodical morning rituals to the layout of the rebbe's yeshiva.

Its critical approach to Mea Shearim will certainly not be appreciated by some viewers. But say this for Kadosh: it tries hard to be realistic and honest, which is more than can be said of many films these days.

Ofra Haza songs available on Prince of Egypt soundtrack

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Best known in North America for her vocal contribution to the Prince of Egypt soundtrack, Ofra Haza was one of the most important stars in Israel when she died Feb. 23.

At the time of her death, Haza had established herself on the international scene as a singer and concert performer, and had contributed to a number of film soundtracks.

Haza recorded her first record album after her military service, and began a career that would lead her to worldwide success and result in 16 gold and platinum recordings. In 1983, Haza's performance at the Eurovision Song Contest won second prize and gave her a song, Chai, which was identified with her for the rest of her life.

Ben Dunkelman, hero in War of Independence, profiled on TV

By BEN ROSE
CJN Reporter

TORONTO — One of the most noteworthy victories in Israel's War of Independence was the opening of the road between Jerusalem and the coastal plain.

Against stiff Arab opposition, Major Ben Dunkelman, a Canadian, led the forces liberating this road.

His exploits are chronicled in the TV film, Ben Dunkelman, The Reluctant Warrior, running on the History channel, March 22, at 9 p.m. in the series The Canadians.

Dunkelman died in Toronto in June 1997, at age 83.

The film, narrated by Patrick Watson, tells how prime minister David Ben-Gurion congratulated Dunkelman.

Eventually the highway was renamed the Road of Valour. "Today, on the road between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, you can still see trucks who didn't make it," said Watson.

Dunkelman was the son of a penniless Polish immigrant who founded Tip Top Tailors. "He was a rich kid who revolutionized history," the film said of the man who fought in two wars.

No sooner had Dunkelman made a name for himself in World War II with the Queen's Own Rifles, winning the Distinguished Service Order for bravery, (his specialty was deadly fire from a mortar crew) than he returned to Canada to became the Canadian president of the Haganah, which recruited 1,000 Canadians to fight for Israel.

Using a fake British passport, Dunkelman evaded surveillance and joined the elite Palmach at Ben-Gurion's urging.

Dunkelman's first superior in 1948, Yitzhak Rabin, then 26, gave him the order to open the road out of Jerusalem.

Dunkelman then went on to lead Israel's 7th Brigade in its capture of Nazareth and the whole Galilee.

It is to his credit that Dunkelman refused to drive the Arab population out of Nazareth, said Dr. David Bercusson of Calgary, a military historian. "He didn't think it was a soldier's job and he wanted to fight a clean war."

"I would rather have him as a friend than an enemy, but deep down he was a very emotional man," said former Israel prime minister Shimon Peres in the film.

Ironically, Israel today doesn't give enough credit to Machal, the volunteer group of Canadians and others, who helped to establish its independence, said Bercusson.

The film shows that Dunkelman believes that he was turned down by the Canadian Navy when he first tried to enlist because he was Jewish.

He also comments on Gen. Dwight Eisenhower's "patronizing" talk to the Allied troops as they awaited the Normandy invasion, and he criticizes Canadian prime minister Mackenzie King for his policy on conscription.

The film also revealed that Dunkelman wanted Ben-Gurion to establish an all Canadian Machal, and despite their friendship, the prime minister refused.

Dunkelman acquired his love of Israel from his mother, Rose Dunkelman, the film said, noting that she used the family home at Sunnybrook Farm as a salon to entertain visiting Zionists.

She also established Balfour Beach, a cottage resort on Lake Simcoe, after learning that Jews could not rent or buy cottages at that time.

Dunkelman's love for Israel began at the age of 17, when he was given passage to Palestine along with $500 spending money.

"He developed an attachment to the land," the film noted, and spent an extra year working the land and guarding Tel Ashar, which was surrounded by hostile Arab villages.

Peres said Ben-Gurion was delighted to have Dunkelman on board, referring to him as having "the authority of experience."

His marriage in Israel to an Israeli corporal, Yael Lifshitz, is recorded, as well as their return to Canada, for Dunkelman did not believe he was cut out to be a soldier.

Michael A. Levine was executive producer for Great North Productions.

Ofra immortalized on video

Two years later, Haza released her first international album, Yemenite Songs, which consisted of a collection of interpretations of devotional poetry set to a strong dance beat.

Later, her song, Im Nin Alu reached No. 1 on both the German and Euro charts. Her album, Shaday, sold over one million copies and a later album, Kirya, was nominated for a Grammy Award.

But Haza's success did not stop there. In 1998 she recorded three tracks for the Prince of Egypt soundtrack and seven tracks for the soundtrack for the Minnie Driver film, The Governess. Many people felt that the soundtrack was the only redeeming feature of The Governess.

Haza also performed on several other film soundtracks, including the main title song of Queen Margot, a 1994 French costume drama, and three songs on the Wild Orchid soundtrack, a controversial 1990 film starring Mickey Rourke and Jacqueline Bisset.

All of the above mentioned films are readily available on video, as are two videos released by Ergo Media Inc. in the United States, which can be ordered at www.jewishvideo.com or by calling 800-695-3746.

The first video, Israel On Parade: A Variety Show is a program recorded by Israeli television to celebrate Israel's independence day several years ago. A number of major Israeli stars appear on this tape and Haza does only the opening number, Chai. But the video offers some wonderful music and is very entertaining for those who enjoy Israeli songs.

The second video, Ofra Haza: From Dusk to Dawn was also produced for Israeli television. The program follows Haza around on a "typical" evening of performing, beginning in a hangar at an Israeli Air Force base, where she does Chai. She continues by singing at an army outpost, then goes to Jaffa and performs at several venues there. But the entire program centres around Haza.

The video is an excellent example of the wide range of material that made up her repertoire, and provides a very entertaining sampling of her work and style.

Deep South rich in Jewish history

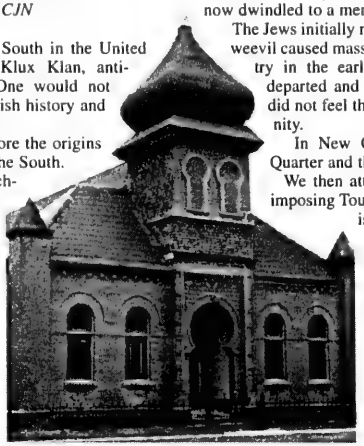
By FERNE KIRCHNER AND PATSI MANDELBAUM
Special to The CJN

When one thinks of the deep South in the United States, one thinks of the Ku Klux Klan, anti-Semitism, and the Civil War. One would not expect to find an area rich in Jewish history and culture.

We undertook this trip to explore the origins and contributions of the Jews in the South.

We were able to trace the richness of Jewish life along the Mississippi River through Tennessee, Mississippi and Louisiana by following the Cultural Corridor Tour put together by the Museum of Southern Jewish Experience.

The MSJE is located in Mississippi and is on a site that attracts over 500 campers each summer. Its collection of artifacts and documents interprets the long and rich tradition of Jewish life in the South.



The Gemiluth Chassed Synagogue (1891) is the oldest in Mississippi.

The collection includes ritual and ceremonial items from synagogues and families, furniture and architectural elements, and art and memorabilia.

Our journey began in Memphis with a visit to the magnificent Temple Israel and a view of its dramatic sanctuary. The temple also exhibits the extensive Adler collection of Judaica, which reflects the Adlers' personal experiences fleeing Europe on the eve of the Holocaust.

The executive director of the temple talked to us about the community – only 10,000 in number – and about how the Jews of Memphis remain very dedicated to preserving their heritage; particularly in an area where there is a church on every other corner.

A visit to the nearby JCC and its state-of-the-art facilities is a monument to a united community.

Our next stop was the town of Vicksburg in Mississippi. Jews had settled in Vicksburg as early as 1811 and were so heartened by their acceptance into the community that many fought for the Confederacy in the Civil War.

In fact, the historic Anshe Chesed cemetery is located adjacent to the Military Park. Many of the gravestones date back to the 1800s, and have beautiful designs and inscriptions on the headstones.

Our travels took us to Natchez, Miss., once a thriving Jewish community of about 150 families. Almost every block in the town contains a building with some Jewish connection.

The focal point was the neo-classical Temple Bnai Israel built in 1905. The stained glass windows, the solid dark walnut pews, the Ark of Italian marble and the century-old organ make it one of the loveliest synagogues in the South.

We were met by a member of the community, which has now dwindled to a mere 14 people.

The Jews initially moved from Natchez when the boll-weevil caused massive destruction to the cotton industry in the early 1900s. Succeeding generations departed and moved to big cities because they did not feel the same connections to the community.

In New Orleans, we explored the French Quarter and the historical Garden District.

We then attended the Shabbat services at the imposing Touro Synagogue. The main sanctuary is spectacular with its antique Ark and exquisite Torahs, and the chapel has a beautiful Ida Kohlmeyer stained glass window.

New Orleans has many important Jewish sites and an extensive history of Jewish economical, cultural and philanthropic contributions.

Some sites of American historical and cultural interest include: Beale Street in Memphis and the home of the Blues; Graceland and the home of Elvis; Clarksdale and the home of the Delta Blues Museum and our favourite blues singer, Super Chikan; Vicksburg, the site of a famous Civil War battle and the home of the Walnut Hills restaurant; and Natchez with its array of lovely ante-bellum homes.

We were so moved by what we saw and experienced throughout the tour and we hope that this will be the first of many more explorations into our Jewish heritage.

Ashkenaz on TV

Vision TV is showing a short segment on last summer's Ashkenaz parade, as part of the human affairs show, Skylight.

The segment focuses on Andrew Katz, 20, who came to Toronto from a small, rural Michigan community. During his month in Toronto, Katz helped organize the Yiddish cultural festival and used his dramatic arts experience to develop the puppet drama called Transformation.

The Ashkenaz segment airs March 20 at 7 p.m. and is repeated at 10:30 p.m. and midnight, and at 4:30 a.m., 10 a.m. and 1:30 p.m. the next day.

Fleisher hits his stride on PGA Seniors Tour

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — All right, so maybe Tiger Woods had the best golfing season of anyone in the last 25 years, with eight straight victories, beginning with four in 1999.

But on the Senior Tour for golfers 50 and over, Bruce Fleisher was just as dominating: seven victories, seven second-place finishes, Player of the Year, Rookie of the Year, winner of the Byron Nelson Award for the player with the lowest average (69.19), rookie record for money earned ($2,515,705), and 56 rounds in the 60s, a Senior Tour record.

Fleisher's $2.5 million in winnings was one-third more than he won in more than 400 starts in an on-again, off-again PGA career that spanned 28 years.

This year, Fleisher has continued his winning ways. After six events, he leads the Senior Tour in earnings, having taken home $440,939. He's second in the Senior Tour's all-round rankings, which takes into account eight key statistics: scoring, putting, eagles, birdies, sand saves, greens in regulation, driving accuracy and driving distance.

Driving accuracy and his short game have always been Fleisher's strong suits. In 1998, his last year on the PGA Tour, the Florida resident finished first in driving accuracy with 81.4 percent of fairways hit. So far this season, he's improved that average to 83.2 percent, to rank eighth on the Senior Tour.

While remaining accurate, Fleisher has improved his driving distance by almost nine yards since leaving the PGA Tour – 265 yards this year versus 256 in 1998, placing him in 28th place. In scoring average he's third (69.36), in sand save percentage he's sixth (68.8) and he's hit 72.2 percent of greens in regulation, ranking him sixth.

Fleisher burst onto the national golfing scene after winning the U.S. Amateur in 1968. That win earned him a spot in the Masters tournament, where the 20-year-old college student played in a foursome with Arnold Palmer. Fleisher shot a 69 to beat the reigning king by four strokes.

His brash style and wild clothing brought him a fan club, Brucie's Babies, but a few years later he quit the pro tour because his wife, Wendy, had a difficult pregnancy and at one time, wasn't expected to survive the birth of their daughter, Jessica.

Bruce Fleisher

Fleisher decided to cut down on his schedule and in 1983 became a club pro, the last few years at the Williams Island Club in North Miami Beach, a Jewish club.

In 1991, he started a comeback and won his only PGA event, the New England Classic, over Ian Baker-Finch. Fleisher sank a 50-foot birdie putt on the seventh playoff hole to defeat the Welsh golfer. From there, Fleisher enjoyed moderate success; his best year was 1992, when he won $236,516 and finished 68th on the money list.

Missing the cut only once in 31 events, he discovered that it was more important to keep the ball in play than to hit long tee shots – a fixation that may have started when he out-drove Palmer by 30 yards on the opening hole of the Masters.

Despite his Senior Tour accomplishments, Fleisher said his two trips to Israel were his best experiences. In 1969, he won the Maccabiah Games gold medal in golf (the same year he was a member of the Walker Cup team) and in 1989, he returned as coach of the American team.

"The second time was even better because I had a chance to actually tour the country," he said. "Even the course in Caesarea is built on ancient ruins."

In 1999, Fleisher was the first rookie to lead the Senior Tour in earnings since Lee Trevino in 1990. His seven wins tied him with Miller Barber, Bruce Crampton and Trevino as the only players to win seven events in their first Senior Tour seasons.

Fleisher plans to stay on the Senior Tour as long as possible. "My career is just starting," he said.

Tigers roar to the top

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The CHAT Tigers spoiled the bar mitzvah party for their hosts at the 13th Annual Joseph Weiner Memorial Tournament in Baltimore recently, when the boys team came home with the championship win. The girls team finished second.

The Tigers avenged a round robin loss to the host team from Beth Tfilah, who own city bragging rights after winning Baltimore's C Division title, said Paull Simmons of CHAT.

The Tigers advanced to the championship game after defeating a team from Washington by 17 points. In the final, the Tigers used their run and gun offence to wear down their opponents and register a 12-point win, Simmons said.

Despite leading at the half of the championship game, the girls team eventually lost to their rivals from Beth Tfilah. They simply couldn't contain the Baltimore team's star player, Stacey Hollander, "who could drive and shoot the lights out," Simmons said.

CHAT's Ami Warner was named tournament MVP and a first team all-star. Joining him as first all-star was Tigers' captain Avi Sargon while Michael Wilchesky was named second team all-star.

About Food

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

Hamantaschen, triangular shaped pastries stuffed with various fillings, are a popular Purim treat. They can be made from sweet yeast or cookie dough, phyllo or flaky pastry. Traditional fillings include prunes (lekvar) or poppy seeds (moon). Ground dates, apricots, raisins, even thick jam or preserves, also make delicious fillings. Hamantaschen (and kreplach), with their fillings hidden inside, are symbolic of the hidden aspect of the miracle of Purim.

This year, why not try a new "angle"? Use chocolate kisses, chocolate spread (e.g., Hashahar pareve cocoa spread) or a dab of peanut butter topped with some chocolate chips!

Melting Pot Memories by Judy Kancigor is a nostalgic, family-style cookbook packed with recipes from 156 contributors. There are old photos, Yiddish expressions, wonderful memories and heirloom recipes like Tanta Esther Gittel's Husband's Second Wife Lena's Nut Cake! Like a well-worn snapshot, it captures a moment in time. To order, call 714-525-8552.

Because her family wouldn't touch poppy seed filling and preferred chocolate to fruit, Kancigor created her own tradition with this delicious recipe. Enjoy!

CHOCOLATE HAMANTASCHEN

8 oz. cream cheese
1/2 lb. margarine (2 sticks)
3 tbsp. sugar
2 cups flour

Bring cheese and margarine to room temperature; then mix. Add sugar and flour. Chill until firm. Roll and cut out with floured glass. Fill with Chocolate filling (or use fresh or canned fruit or poppy seed filling if you like. Solo apricot filling is really good.) Form into shapes. To make hamantaschen, pinch in 3 places equally apart to form triangles. The rest of the year, pinch together once in the centre to make a filled bow. Bake at 425 for 10 to 15 minutes. Sprinkle with powdered (confectioners) sugar.

Chocolate Filling: Combine 3 squares unsweetened chocolate, 1 tsp. vanilla and 1 can sweetened condensed milk. Heat slowly and stir until smooth; let cool.

Poppy Seed Filling: Boil 1/2 pound ground poppy seeds with 1/2 cup milk and 2 to 3 tbsp. sugar. Add a handful of raisins or mixed candied peel. When cold, fold in 3 egg whites, stiffly beaten, and 1 tbsp. cognac.

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

לקראת פורים, בנושא ההומור

כל תינוק אותו הכיר:
זה היה האיש חַמְפַזֵּר,
המפזר מכפר אַז"ר."

כך פותחת לאה גולדברג את סיפורה השירי. מיד, עם הפתיחה ובעצם הכותרת, חילד יודע שהולך להיות כאן בלגן משעשע. הסיטואציה והלשון חיא של פיזור, כולל שם הכפר: "אז"ר". בהמשך מסופר על דמות שאין בה שמץ מודעות לסדר יום-יומי שחילד מאומן בו.

"קם בבקר חמפזר
ויושב על המטה,
ושואל: 'ישתי כבר,
או שכבתי זה עתה?'"

"את סופו אין איש יודע,
את קצו אין איש מכיר"

....

פורים שמח.

Iranian Jews denied own counsel

BY JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Ten of the 13 Iranian Jews facing trial on charges of spying for Israel and the United States are not being allowed to select their own lawyers, according to advocates for the accused.

Instead, the judge is insisting that the prisoners take court-appointed attorneys.

Trial slated April 13

The judge claims that the lawyers selected by the 10 prisoners do not have signed retainers indicating that the lawyers are their chosen counsel.

However, the lawyers are unable to obtain the necessary signatures from the defendants because the judge has denied them access to the prisoners.

"This is more than a Catch-22 situation. It is a violation of the most basic legal and human rights," said Ronald Lauder, chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, which has been advocating on behalf of the 13 since last summer.

Three of the 13 were released on bail in February and were able to sign the documents enabling them to choose their lawyers, but the other 10 remain in jail in the southern city of Shiraz.

All could face the death penalty if convicted at next month's trial.

Both the United States and Israel have denied the 13 spied for them.

Several weeks ago, the families were notified of the trial date and told to find attorneys.

Some did not select lawyers right away because they had been informed by government officials that they did not need them, and they feared that hiring an attorney would appear to be an admission of guilt, said Pooya Dayanim, a spokesperson for the Los Angeles-based Council of Iranian American Organizations.

Damages claim by former agunah may set precedent

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A woman whose civilly divorced husband refused, for 14 years, to grant her a get, a religious Jewish divorce, is suing him for $1.35 million in damages in a precedent-setting case being heard by Quebec Superior Court.

The husband's lawyer is arguing that a 10-year-old amendment to the Canadian Divorce Act that limits the remedies available to a recalcitrant spouse is unconstitutional. It discriminates in favour of Jewish plaintiffs, the husband argues. In addition, he says, civil law has no jurisdiction to intervene in what is essentially a religious matter.

The two weeks of hearings before Judge Israel Mass are scheduled to wrap up March 24.

The case is being watched closely by agunah activists internationally, said Evelyn Brook, chair of the Coalition for the Get in Montreal.

"This case will determine whether men who use their power unfairly to shackle women and condemn them to the life of an agunah are liable," she said.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Rabbi Honoured

OTTAWA — Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas was honoured recently in New York at the Orthodox Union's (OU) Rabbinic Centennial Medallion Awards Dinner. The OU recognized Rabbi Bulka and 11 other rabbis for their outstanding contributions to Orthodox Jewish life.

Head Tax Dropped

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) have welcomed the announcement that the government has dropped the so-called head tax for refugees. The $975 per person landing fee represented an "insurmountable financial barrier to, and may thus have a chilling effect on, individuals and families who might otherwise legitimately satisfy entry criteria," the organizations said in a statement.

Rabbi Switches Shuls

WINNIPEG — A popular local rabbi has announced a career change. On Sept. 1, Rabbi Alan Green will move from Beth Israel Synagogue, where he has served for the past eight years, to Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, the city's largest shul. Beth Israel last year announced a $2-million expansion.

ISRAEL

Pay Intifadah Damages

JERUSALEM — In a precedent-setting ruling, an Israeli court last week ordered the state to pay about $169,000 in damages to five Palestinians injured by Israeli soldiers during the intifadah. The judge ruled that the state failed to prove the plaintiffs had thrown stones and even if it had, injuring them is not considered "reasonable force."

Druze Reunions

JERUSALEM — Israel has agreed in principle to a Syrian proposal to allow regular reunions for Druze families living on opposite sides of the Israeli-Syrian border. A spokesperson for the Red Cross said details still had to be worked out.

Plan Faces Opposition

JERUSALEM — An Israeli government committee has approved the sale of a site next to the Western Wall for use as an Orthodox school and bar mitzvah venue. The sale reportedly faces strong opposition from archeologists, conservationists and the Housing and Religious Affairs ministries.

Natural Gas Find

JERUSALEM — Israel has frozen negotiations to purchase natural gas from Egypt after finding offshore reserves. According to Infrastructure Minister Eli Suissa, the reserves could meet the country's natural gas needs for the next 15 years.

PA Boycott

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority said it is boycotting goods made in Jewish settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. A Palestinian minister said officials have begun searching Palestinian shops and will confiscate any products made in the settlements.

WORLD

Doctor 'Unfit'

BERLIN — The last surviving doctor who worked at Auschwitz was declared unfit last week to stand trial on murder charges. German officials confirmed that prosecutors had dropped their investigation of Hans Munch, 88, after medical examiners found he was suffering from Alzheimer's disease.

Assets in Austria

NEW YORK — Austria holds some $10 billion in assets that belonged to Jews killed in the Holocaust, according to the secretary general of the World Jewish Congress. Israel Singer cited a declassified U.S. document showing that the Austrian government took possession of the money in 1953. WJC officials say they plan to use the document to press Austria to pay compensation.

Former Nazi Out

VIENNA — A former member of the Nazi SS who was deported after living in the United States for nearly 45 years arrived last week in Austria. Ferdinand Hammer, 78, was stripped of his U.S. citizenship in 1996 for concealing his wartime activities. Hammer faces no charges in Austria, according to officials in Vienna.

Rabbi Acquitted

NEW YORK — A leading rabbi in Brooklyn has been acquitted of making death threats against a woman who had accused her father of rape. Five witnesses still face witness-tampering charges in the case in which Rabbi Bernard Freilich was acquitted. The woman's father still faces trial on the rape charges.

Women Study More

NEW YORK — American Jewish women are more likely to be engaged in Jewish learning than men, according to a study conducted by Hebrew University. The study documents a major cultural reversal, following thousands of years in which Jewish education was overwhelmingly a male province.

CJC calls for Dismissal of Vatican Official

OTTAWA — In a letter to the Vatican last week, Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen called for the removal of a priest for saying that Jews are responsible for the death of Jesus.

German Jesuit priest Peter Gumpel, who is overseeing the canonization process of the war-time Pope Pius XII, said in an interview in Rome with CBC-TV's The National: "It is a fact that the Jews have killed Christ. This is an undeniable historical fact."

The comments came on the eve of Pope John Paul's historic visit to Israel and less than a week after the Pope asked for forgiveness for the Catholic's Church's treatment of minorities.

In a statement, Ronen said "we are shocked and outraged that more than 30 years after the Catholic Church officially rejected it, a senior Vatican official has endorsed this anti-Semitic calumny. Tantamount to heresy, the statement contravenes the official doctrine of the Catholic Church...and aims to undermine the determined efforts of Pope John Paul, throughout his papacy, to repair relationships with the Jewish people."

Rabbi raises questions about Haider visit

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The president of the Montreal Board of Rabbis says the Jewish community should have acceded to far right-wing Austrian politician Joerg Haider's request for a tour of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

Writing in the latest issue of the Shaare Zion Congregation newsletter, Rabbi Lionel Moses says that, in hindsight, the community leadership's decision to turn down Haider when he was here last month was "a missed opportunity" and a "public relations fiasco."

"Meeting with Haider publicly, guiding him through the Holocaust museum, would not have granted him the legitimacy or respectability he seeks, but instead might well have sent him a message that…his apologies for his racist statements will only ring true if the policies of his government respect the civil and human rights of every person who lives in Austria, no matter their country of origin or their place of birth," Rabbi Moses writes.

Community criticized for 'overreaction'

The occasion could have served as a chance to "educate" Haider and "warn" him that his "every action is being watched, his every word is being recorded, that he can no longer hide his xenophobic and anti-Semitic statements behind a cloak of feigned ignorance or misinterpretations, that as a mature politician with national ambitions in Austria, he will be judged not only by what he says from here on, but more importantly by what he does."

At the same time, it might have allowed the community to get to know Haider a little better. "The reality is that we do not know much about Joerg Haider."

Rabbi Moses criticizes the organized community for its "overreaction" to Haider's unannounced visit to Montreal Feb. 16 and17.

In trying to "kill a fly with a sledgehammer," Rabbi Moses thinks Haider's detractors world wide may be enhancing his popularity. The "persistent attacks from the outside" appear to be having the opposite effect to that intended, he writes.

According to research he has done, Rabbi Moses says he could not find "more than half a dozen" statements over more than a decade by Haider that have anti-Semitic or neo-Nazi overtones.

"I do not doubt for a moment that Haider's conservative brand of Austrian nationalism promotes an Austria made up primarily of German-speaking Austrians. But equally, I hear Haider reiterate his apologies for his most egregious statements, which he characterizes as insensitive. Again and again, he has repeated that he has no sympathy for neo-Nazis."

Rabbi Moses wrote the article in his capacity as spiritual leader of Shaare Zion, a Conservative synagogue of about 850 members. Rabbis from the mainstream branches of Judaism are members of the Board of Rabbis.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region president Dorothy Zalcman Howard said Rabbi Moses' opinion is a "minority" one among the rabbinate.

Asked if there had been any second thoughts on how CJC handled the Haider visit, she said "absolutely not.

"We have had positive feedback from the Jewish and non-Jewish communities, including religious groups and government officials," she said.

She thinks the chilly reception from the community in Montreal was a contributing factor in Haider's decision to resign the leadership of the Freedom Party shortly afterward.

"The feeling among the leadership was that this visit was a trial balloon, an attempt to gain

Israel's delicate weave

From the editor's desk

One of the days at the Eighth International Conference of the Jewish media in Jerusalem last month was dedicated to exploring different stresses pulling at the seams of Israeli society. In fact, one of the sessions was called, appropriately, The Delicate Weave of Israeli Society.

Three general aspects of Israeli society were explored: the "pushes and the pulls" of the religious and secular communities; the lingering poverty that eats away at the self-esteem of certain sectors of society, and the impact of the last decade of immigration to Israel.

The session on religious-secular stresses brought together four panelists, each representative of, though not speaking on behalf of, a different spiritual approach to life. Though the labels are inadequate, the panelists could be described roughly as modern Orthodox; Conservative; agnostic traditionally learned secular; and atheistic non-traditionally learned secular.

The discussion began politely, but ended in a public display of recrimination, contempt and acrimony, an ironic but painful proof of the very pushes and pulls we hoped no longer to see.

The next session dealt with socio-economic themes. The discussion was candid; the panelists were critical – though in measured tones – of the policies of the present government and of past governments for paying too little attention to the chronic poverty in Israeli society, for subordinating pressing social needs to pressing security needs.

"Poverty in Israel is a crucial issue," said Prof. Henriette Calev-Dahan of Ben-Gurion University.

"There is economic distress within society for certain of its members," said Arieh Barnea, principal of Denmark High School in Jerusalem. "Why is it," Barnea rhetorically asked the audience of visiting journalists, "the grandchildren of some of the original pioneers who came to Israel from North Africa, still live in poverty?"

Despite the many worthy news-making achievements in the high-tech realm, at the other end of society unemployment is at a modern high. Not since the early years of the state have so many people been looking for work. One-sixth of all Israelis live below the poverty line, including some 8,000 people who are holding down steady jobs, Calev-Dahan told us.

She spoke about the "old poor," who have lived in conditions of poverty for more than three generations, and the "new poor," an underclass of urban or rural worker who are relatively recent arrivals in Israel. And she unequivocally blamed the government for the apparent absence of sensitivity, urgency and coherence in its policies towards the poor.

"There is, or should be, an irrefutable connection," Calev-Dahan said, "between human dignity and Jewish identity. To help out the weaker elements of society is really a Jewish position," she said. There is no place, either in society or in conscience, she urged, for disregarding the plight of the poor.

Speaking to us separately about the impact on Israeli society of the past decade of immigration were both Natan Sharansky, minister of the interior, and Yuli Tamir, minister for aliyah and absorption. Both were extremely articulate, engaging speakers.

Sharansky made the interesting point that the aliyah of one million people from the FSU had brought an end to the paternalism that typified Israeli officialdom's approach to absorption in previous times. Whereas with earlier waves of immigrants, the government deigned to know what settlement policies were best for the newly arrived, this wave of immigrants has taken its settlement upon its own shoulders. In 20 cities, Sharansky told us, there are deputy mayors who have been in Israel less than five years, making decisions about their respective communities in ways that were unheard of even one generation ago.

As a result, the prevailing absorption-cultural ethos has been transformed from that of "melting pot" to that of "mosaic," a concept quite familiar to Canadians.

The unprecedented million-strong aliyah over the past decade has been a huge success, Tamir told us. More than 85 percent are considered "integrated" into the larger society. But, she added, there are a number of problems too.

"Immigration is a trauma for the family and for the individuals," Tamir emphasized. "Immigrants come to a new land with the expectation that their new life will be better at least for their children. If this does not work out, the family falls under tremendous pressure. Adolescents are often the victims of this trauma and this pressure. Thus, we are starting to see problems of violence, drugs and joblessness among immigrant youth," Tamir explained.

"We haven't yet adequately studied the psychological dimension of the trauma of immigration," Tamir added. But she left the clear impression she soon would, with a view to reducing the number of victims.

The weave of Israeli society is indeed delicate. There are so many different strands in the stitching that interlaces the disparate peoples who live there.

The fabric is multi-textured, multi-layered and muti-coloured. So many conflicting demands and so many competing interests tug at its edges, and so little bulk props it up at the centre. Sometimes it seems to stretch beyond all reasonable limit. Still, it holds, frayed at the margins but a tough and resilient cloth, a miracle fusion of opposites, of clash and harmony, of diversity and uniformity, of gruffness and sentiment.

CJC to Queen's Park: End Lord's Prayer

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has called on the Ontario government to abide by a high court ruling and end the recitation of the Lord's Prayer before city council meetings and in the provincial legislature.

In letters to Gary Carr, the Speaker of the Legislature, and to Tony Clement, minister of municipal affairs, CJC Ontario region chair Keith Landy cites a ruling last year by the Ontario Court of Appeal, which found that reciting the Lord's Prayer prior to city and town council meetings was unconstitutional.

Court suggests moment of silence

"Clearly, the [court] has ruled that the Lord's Prayer cannot be recited at municipal or town council meetings," Landy wrote to Clement. "This should be communicated to all municipalities in Ontario."

Landy's letter was prompted by the continuing recitation of the prayer by the town council in Carleton Place, Ont. The town, and probably other municipalities in Ontario, have ignored the court's finding.

Landy also called on Carr to end the practice of reciting the Lord's Prayer at the opening sessions of the provincial legislature.

CJC pointed out the court's suggestion that the prayer could be replaced by a non-denominational prayer or a moment of silence, similar to the current practice in the House of Commons.

The court found that reciting the Lord's Prayer violates religious freedom. It said that the purpose of reciting the prayer was to "impose a Christian moral tone on the deliberations of council," and that everyone is entitled to attend a council meeting without feeling pressure to conform "to the religious practices of the majority."

The court ruled in the case of a Jewish resident of Penetanguishene, Ont., who complained that he felt coerced to stand and recite the prayer at the start of local council meetings.

The court also issued an injunction preventing Penetanguishene from engaging in the prayer, a practice that dated back 100 years.

Alexander Roman, executive assistant to Carr, told The CJN that MPPs are not required to recite the Lord's Prayer. He said any changes to the practice could come about if enough members make their views known to the Speaker.

David Caplan, one of three Jewish MPPs at Queen's Park, told The CJN that the Lord's Prayer has never been an issue for him.

"It's not something I've thought about. I'm not offended by it," he said.

He said he doesn't recite the prayer. "I don't say their prayers, and I don't expect them to say mine." However, all MPPs stand for the prayer, he said. That's because they rise when the Speaker enters the chamber. The Speaker does not sit until the opening prayers are finished.

The CJN's calls to Clement's office were not returned by press time.

Oberlander's lawyer subject of law society complaint

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress had filed a complaint with the Law Society of Upper Canada about a Kitchener lawyer's remarks that Congress believes might incite violence against the city's Jews.

The remarks by Eric Hafemann, lawyer for former killing squad member Helmut Oberlander, are "inflammatory" and "in essence" threaten violence, said a Congress letter to the Law Society, the governing body for Ontario's lawyers. Hafemann rejects Congress' interpretation of his remarks.

In an interview with the Kitchener-Waterloo Record, Hafemann said people in Kitchener "will explode" if Ottawa attempts to deport his client.

"Such statements seem intended to have an inflammatory effect, to intimidate decision-makers and to intimidate segments of a community who might be the subject of the 'explosion'," Congress' letter contends. Congress also brought its concerns about potential violence to the attention of the Kitchener-Waterloo police.

Hafemann made his remarks after a Federal Court judge found that Oberlander entered Canada by misrepresenting his wartime activities. The court found that Oberlander served as an interpreter with an Einsatzkommando unit – a Nazi murder squad that was responsible for murdering tens of thousand of Jews and others earmarked by the Nazis for death. Had Oberlander told Canadian immigration authorities about his involvement in the unit, he would never have been admitted to Canada, the court stated.

Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said lawyers "can't just go out and say what they want. There are guidelines regarding the way a lawyer can respond to what happens to his client." Landy said Congress was also concerned about Hafemann's remarks that stated Ottawa was catering to "special interest groups." That is a "code word" for the Jewish community, he stated.

Hafemann said Congress has misinterpreted his remarks and failed to contact him to hear his side of the issue. The anger in Kitchener is directed against Ottawa, not the Jewish community, he said.

Hafemann said his remarks about the community's anger were made during a one-hour interview with the Record. He said he declined in the interview "to draw in ethnic groups" and he limited his remarks to the anger he perceived was mounting against Ottawa.

The Record quotes him saying that Congress is "bringing incredible pressure on the government to have his citizenship revoked and deported. It is an incredible position to take when, at this point, we are dealing with nothing more or less than an irregularity in the immigration process of Oberlander."

Hafemann told The CJN there was no evidence that Oberlander personally took part in atrocities and so, should never have been the subject of a denaturalization hearing in the first place.

"Anybody who'd have taken the time to read the [Federal Court judge's] report, they'd have said, let's think about this…because it's not in the interests of people of the Jewish faith to pursue [someone who was] an innocent teenager [Oberlander]."

By involving local police, Congress was acting irresponsibly and was engaged in "an attempt to intimidate counsel," Hafemann added.

Landy denied that Congress had brought "incredible pressure on the government." He said Congress had done no more than lobby for legal action against all Nazi war criminals – not specifically against Oberlander.

Congress believes "that the words stated by [Hafemann] pose a real threat to our community…Our community has become particularly vulnerable to the larger community," he said.

Hafemann said he has had friends in the Kitchener Jewish community for 30 years. "I'm not about to do anything that would somehow leave disparaging remarks on the Jewish community."

He said he would defend himself before the Law Society and is considering laying a complaint of his own, alleging an attempt by Congress to intimidate counsel.

In other developments, Hafemann said he has been given until May 15 to file written submissions to the Minister of Justice pointing out where, he believes, the Federal Court judge erred in the Oberlander case. He said he hopes the submissions convince the minister not to recommend that Oberlander lose his citizenship.

Imported yarmulkes can be subject to tariffs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For most male Jews, wearing a religious head covering – a yarmulke, or kippah – is an integral element of their ritual observance. For many other male Jews, it is part of their very identity as Jews. But as far as the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency is concerned, a yarmulke is considered no more than a hat or cap, and for more than a year, some shipments of skull caps entering Canada have been subject to a tariff of between 12.5 percent and 15 percent, despite a specific exemption from tariffs on certain named "religious objects."

Notwithstanding the extra charge on religious headgear, Canadian Jewish Congress believes that constitutional rights to freedom of religion are not involved.

"This has nothing to do with religious discrimination. It's essentially a tariff issue," said Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

The tariff applies to yarmulkes coming from countries that do not enjoy free trade agreements with Canada. Yarmulkes manufactured in Israel or the United States are not subject to the tariff, if the merchandise arrives directly from those countries and carries a certificate of origin. Trans-shipped goods – merchandise from a free trade country that arrives via another destination – can be subject to tariffs if the original lot was broken up, Prutschi said.

A Finance Department spokesperson, who declined to be identified by name, estimated that 80 percent to 90 percent of yarmulkes entering Canada are not subject to duty, primarily because they arrive from the United States or Israel.

Even yarmulkes that arrived in Canada prior to January 1999 from non-free trade partners entered without duty being imposed. But during a routine review of merchandise entering Canada, a customs inspector found that yarmulkes were not exempt from duty – though for years none had been demanded.

Debbie Main, acting director of appeals for Canada Customs' Hamilton region, said yarmulkes had been miscategorized by importers, and had therefore entered without tariff. She said Sikh and Muslim headgear is also subject to customs tariffs.

Under Canada Customs law, certain religious objects are exempt from tariffs – but they must be explicitly named in a section containing exemptions. The tariff section names religious artifacts like mezuzot, havdalah candles and Torah scrolls, as well as the religious objects of other faiths, but it does not mention yarmulkes. A second section explicitly exempts tallesim (prayer shawls), but that section likewise does not mention yarmulkes.

Canada Customs imposed retroactive duties dating back to post-January 1998 imports, said Nick Cybuchowski, president of Counselor Customs Brokers. His firm is aware of 40 requests for additional duty affecting a total of 6,000 to 7,000 kippot that he imported for Aleph Bet Judaica in Toronto. On some of the items, the retailer has been able to obtain NAFTA certificates indicating the yarmulkes were manufactured in the United States, and thus avoid tariff payments, he said.

Retailers, importers and Congress are lobbying the Department of Finance to include yarmulkes as an exempt item, but success is not assured. They would be treated like any other item of headgear, the Finance Department spokesperson said.

To laugh or to cry

If the threat did not glisten with the possibility of more bloodshed, it would be absolutely laughable. Even so, it was a dizzying, dumbfounding descent into the surrealistic world of the morally inverted and the democratically denied, a vain gathering of rulers who distrust each other, dominated by petulant despots.

Two weeks ago in Beirut, the 22 member Arab League concluded its biennial meeting with an 18-point polemic against Israel, the centrepiece of which was a warning to the Jewish state that if it withdraws the IDF unilaterally from Lebanese territory, it will risk all-out war.

To underscore the absurdity of the threat, the very same statement by the Arab League also condemned the Israeli "occupation" of south Lebanon and praised the Hezbollah "defenders" for their "resistance against the occupation."

To say that the propositions are illogical and cannot exist side by side is to point out the obvious. Hezbollah and its allied forces maintain a relentlessly violent campaign against Israel, ostensibly, because Israeli troops are in south Lebanon; Israel declares it will withdraw its troops, willy-nilly, by July 7; Hezbollah and its allied forces threaten Israel with war if Israel actually does what Hezbollah has been trying to get it to do for more than a decade, namely, leave south Lebanon.

Equally obvious however, is the irritated, suddenly panicky disposition of Syria's president Hafez Assad, orchestrating the discordant Arab League strains. In a lead editorial published in Tishreen – the Syrian government mouthpiece which only last month propagated the odious asperities of Holocaust denial – we gain an invaluable insight into the Syrian ruler's reasoning: "A unilateral withdrawal [by the IDF out of south Lebanon] is nothing but an Israeli trick to defuse the anger of the Arab world and to accelerate the process leading to the normalization of relations between Syria and Israel."

One would have thought, after all, that defusing "the anger of the Arab world" was a significant gesture of goodwill. One would have also thought that "accelerat(ing) the process leading to the normalization of relations between Syria and Israel" was an important bilateral objective.

The threat of war against Israel stems from the fact that a unilateral withdrawal out of Lebanon weakens Syria's bargaining position across the negotiating table with Israel. By uncoupling the Lebanese caboose from the bilateral, peace talks train, Israel effectively reduces Syrian leverage in the give and take that must accompany true negotiation and compromise. But given Assad's resentment at Israel for wanting to "normalize relations," one simply does not know whether to laugh or to cry at the peace process predicament in which Israel finds itself with its Syrian neighbour.

Thanks for the Birthright trip

I am a 19-year-old student attending York University in my first year. I recently came back from the Birthright Israel experience trip and I am writing this letter to extend my gratitude to the funders of the program for their generosity in sending my peers and me on a trip to Israel.

I would like them to know that going into this trip, my intentions were basically to relax and meet lots of new people. I did accomplish that; but as well I came out with something more from this trip.

Going to Israel and seeing all the sights really touched me greatly. Being able to learn about the Jewish religion in Israel made me feel proud to be Jewish and gave me a new respect for the religion. This trip was an opportunity of a lifetime. I feel it was a special gift that I was fortunate enough to receive.

I want to thank the funders and everyone else involved for letting me experience the country of Israel. I hope one day I will be able to return and remember all the fond memories that I shared there on the Birthright trip. I hope in the future this trip will be able to continue so others will be as fortunate as I was.

A combined Israeli force of security personnel, border police and army units prevented a deadly terrorist attack recently in Taibe. [Israel photo]

Applauds PA co-operation

More often than not there is much to criticize about Yasser Arafat and his Palestinian Authority. The caption on the front page picture of your March 9 edition shows Israel's General Security Services laying siege to a house in the Israeli-Arab town of Taibe and successfully preventing a deadly terrorist attack. It is reported that four terrorists were killed and one captured in the operation.

What is said in passing is that the Palestinian Authority had assisted Israel in uncovering the terrorist cell. Credit should be given when due, and the Palestinian Authority should be applauded for this important act of co-operation.

Canada deserves credit too

Contrary to Mitchell Danow's report, "Spain gets out of Israel's way at UN" (CJN, March 2), Canada has not been slow to react to attempts to bring Israel into the Western European and Others Group (WEOG) at the United Nations. Indeed, Israel acknowledges and appreciates Canada's efforts to promote Israel's membership in WEOG so that it can, among other things, be eligible to participate in important UN committees and on the Security Council, from which it is currently barred.

Canada, along with the United States, is working vigorously to end a fundamental injustice that makes Israel the only UN member state denied full membership in the influential regional group system.

Asks CJC to consult more

When CJC decisions pertinent to government legislation are decided upon, far more consensus must be sought from our Jewish community and from committees of that community's institutions. Such is not now the case. But it should be given the attention that is crucial to the welfare of this community.

Jerusalem...the most difficult issue

By JOSEPH WILDER

It is widely assumed that Jerusalem will be the most difficult issue to be concluded in the permanent status negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. While it is undeniable that Jerusalem is a core component of the peace process, much of the perceived difficulty associated with its final disposition arises from serious misconceptions about its competing religious, historical and political significance to Jews, Muslims and Christians.

Given the prevailing political reality, it is impossible to envision a final resolution of the Jerusalem issue that does not accept the permanence and legitimacy of Israel's claim to a unified Jerusalem as its capital.

While specific locations in the city do have significance for both Muslims and Christians, Jerusalem – the Western Wall, Temple Mount, City of David, Mount Zion – has religious centrality only for Jews. As the respected historian Martin Gilbert has noted, for Jews, Jerusalem is not a mere city since "it holds the central spiritual and physical place in the history of the Jews as a people."

Moreover, Jerusalem, in its more than 3,000-year history, has only been the political capital of the Jewish nation, beginning in 1004 BCE, when King David declared Jerusalem the capital of the first Jewish kingdom.

In the words of former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek: "Jerusalem was never the capital of any empire or country or conqueror, despite the many rulers who passed through the city; only the Jews declared it their capital. Throughout the more than 12 centuries that Muslims controlled Jerusalem, they did not declare it to be their capital, or even an administrative centre."

A remarkable chain links the Jewish people with the city of Jerusalem. Following the destruction of the First Temple and the Babylonian exile in 586 BCE, the Jews returned 50 years later and rebuilt Jerusalem as their capital which it remained under the Maccabees.

The destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE marked the end of Jewish sovereignty over Jerusalem, but for the next 2,000 years Jews prayed for the restoration of their holy city three times a day. The return to Zion is central in Jewish liturgy and the phrase "Next year in Jerusalem" is the concluding hope of the Passover seder.

Even during their exile, Jews managed to retain a physical attachment to Jerusalem: Communities of religious Jews maintained a presence in the city despite periods of persecution and poverty. By the middle of the 19th century, 50 years before the inception of modern political Zionism, Jews constituted a majority of the city's population. By 1914, there were some 45,000 Jews in Jerusalem out of a total population of 65,000. At the time of statehood in 1948, Jerusalem had 100,000 Jewish and 65,000 Arab residents.

***

In November 1947, leaders of the Zionist movement accepted the United Nations General Assembly plan for a partition of Palestine into a Jewish state and an Arab one. Included in this UN resolution was the plan – which the Zionist leaders reluctantly accepted – to treat Jerusalem as a corpus separatum, an international city.

However, the Palestinian leadership and the Arab states rejected the resolution out of hand and waged war against the incipient Jewish state. In the course of hostilities, David Ben-Gurion took the vexing decision to evacuate the ancient Jewish Quarter of the Old City and other Jewish neighbourhoods in the eastern half of Jerusalem lest they be annihilated by the Jordanian Legion.

In its three-millennia existence, Jerusalem was only physically divided during Jordan's 19-year occupation from 1948 to 1967. During this time, Jewish holy sites were desecrated or destroyed, and Jews barred from the Western Wall. When the Israelis finally reunified Jerusalem following the June 1967 Six Day War, they vowed that the city would never be divided again. Steps were taken to apply Israeli law to the unified city, which was declared "the eternal capital of the Jewish state." The Jewish Quarter was rebuilt, and former Jewish neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem were reestablished and modernized.

At the same time, Israel undertook measures to safeguard the rights of all Jerusalem's citizens, and it gave free access to the holy places of all faiths. At the conclusion of the Six Day War, Defence Minister Moshe Dayan, in deference to Muslim sensitivities, ordered the Israeli flag lowered over the Dome of the Rock and forbade Israeli soldiers to set foot on the Temple Mount. Responsibility for the management of Muslim and Christian holy places was turned over to their respective religious authorities, including the Jordanian-appointed Islamic holy trust, the Wakf.

In significant diplomatic concessions, Israel agreed to permit Arab residents of eastern Jerusalem to participate in the joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation with which Israel undertook bilateral negotiations after the Madrid Peace Conference in 1991. Israel also agreed to have Arab Jerusalemites participate in the election of the Palestinian Legislative Council in January 1996.

In an effort to defuse tensions, Interior Minister Natan Sharansky decided in October 1999 to end the practice of cancelling the residency permits of Arab residents of the city who live outside Israel for more than seven consecutive years. In addition, Public Security Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami moved to significantly reduce the amount of demolitions of illegal buildings in eastern Jerusalem (although it is important to note that normally only four to eight percent of all pending demolition orders were carried out annually).

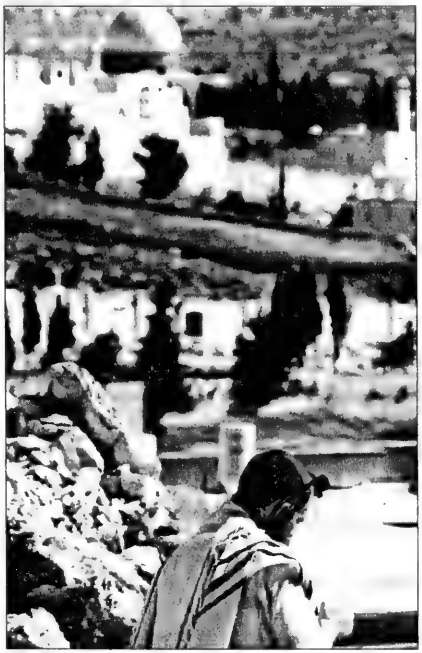
The Oslo accords deferred discussion about Jerusalem until permanent-status negotiations are completed. Israel, from the outset, made very clear its rejection of any plan that entailed "redividing" Jerusalem or having the city serve as the capital of both Israel and a proposed West Bank-Gaza Palestinian state.

Moshe Safdie, the world-renowned architect who has done considerable work in Jerusalem, recently reported on the outcome of a joint Israeli-Palestinian conference on the future of the city. He noted that "regardless of their political affiliations, the conference participants acknowledged that the implementation of Israel's policy [of ensuring that the city would never be physically redivided] has made it all but impossible to configure any kind of separating line that would allow Jerusalem to evolve into two jurisdictions, Israeli and Palestinian, without each of these areas being in fact a mix of both populations.



The difficulties inherent in resolving the status of Jerusalem appear in this photo. A Jew prays; the golden-domed Mosque of Omar is in the background.

"And neither side was prepared to support such a division. Instead, virtually all the participants readily supported the concept that Jerusalem must be one city." Moreover, Safdie explained, with approximately 100,000 Israelis now living across the Green Line and "intermingled into Palestinian neighbourhoods and villages," there is no practical way of returning to the pre-1967 situation where Arabs and Israelis "were neatly settled in neighbourhood clusters on either side of the Green Line."

Israel has rejected the proposal promoted occasionally by the Vatican of returning to the 1947 UN-partition-plan idea of "internationalizing" Jerusalem. Israel sees internationalization as both impractical and unjust, ignoring the Jewish people's unique and special attachment to the city. At the same time, Israel has maintained scrupulous respect for Muslim and Christian religious and cultural institutions in Jerusalem.

In addition, in its October 1994 peace treaty with Jordan, Israel pledged to "respect the present role of the Hashemite Kingdom...in Muslim holy shrines in Jerusalem" and "give high priority to the Jordanian historic role in these shrines" in negotiations over Jerusalem's permanent status. The Israeli attitude is best summed up in the words of former prime minister Shimon Peres that Jerusalem "is closed politically but open religiously."

Many analysts have emphasized the need for "creative solutions" to the Jerusalem issue that would take into account both Muslim religious sensitivities and Palestinian national aspirations, but would not physically redivide the city or undermine Israeli claims.

In the "understanding" on permanent status arrangements they arrived at in November 1995, Israeli government minister Yossi Beilin and Palestinian official Abu Mazen reportedly agreed in principle on an elaborate scheme designed to address Palestinian political interests in Jerusalem while not redividing the city, thereby effectively tempering the whole question of political sovereignty in favour of practical coexistence.

However, no agreement was reached on the permanent political status of the Old City, and the question was left open for further negotiations.

While their understanding was unofficial, Beilin's and Abu Mazen's sensitivity and creativity in handling the Jerusalem issue give hope that a practical solution may yet be found for this complex problem. Israel's commitment to invest resources to enhance the quality of life for Jerusalem's Arab residents, and various ideas for sharing some functional political responsibility in Arab neighbourhoods within overall Israeli sovereignty, also inspire hope that answers to this emotionally and politically charged issue will be found. Still, the starting point for such answers remains the overwhelming Israeli consensus in favour of Jerusalem's continued status as the undivided capital of the State of Israel.

Joseph Wilder is the national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee. The Canada-Israel Committee's 16th Parliamentary Dinner & Policy Conference will be held on March 29 at the Ottawa Congress Centre.

Opinions

The smuggling business

Every once in a while there arrives at the shore of this country a ship that by all ordinary accounts should be declared unseaworthy. It enters Canadian waters and soon is halted and searched by members of the coast guard who want to make sure that this dubious arrival does not present a threat to Canada's safety.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Most likely, however, they will not find bombs or other devices of physical destruction. What they will find is people crammed together like goods for sale, who badly need to get off the ship and onto terra firma, in this case, Canada.

When they arrive and Canadian authorities examine who they are and what papers they bring with them, the inevitable will occur: a significant number of those on board will have no papers at all, claiming that they have fled from an oppressive regime in this or that country, and that they want to make a claim to be recognized as refugees under Canadian and international law. Their cases are examined and judged.

Unfortunately, there is more to it. A number of the passengers, particularly among the younger people, are likely to have been enticed in their own countries to join the boatload of potential refugees and have been offered a free voyage to Canada in return for promises to perform certain services afterwards to pay for the trip. Usually, these people form but a small component of the boatload.

For those who brought them, they represent a significant investment. In fact, they have become indentured to their masters and all too frequently are treated like slaves. They are the cargo that has been smuggled into Canada along with the passengers who can legitimately claim they are refugees from their homeland.

This is a matter with which Elinor Caplan, our new minister of immigration, is seriously concerned, and rightly so. She is committed to our moral and legal responsibilities under international and national law, and she wants refugees to have every opportunity to share the security of Canada. She is now working on ways and means of sorting out the legitimate from the rest. Whether or not this goal can be fully achieved is dubious, but perhaps she can do better than we have done in the past.

It is a problem that calls for wisdom and not for slogans, for humanity and not for hardheartedness. Shall we turn back true refugees because of the presence of some indentured human cargo? The task is to find those who are responsible for this unconscionable traffic and who force us to face a moral and political dilemma.

On principles and politics

The glaring gap between political practice and principle in Israel was evident earlier this month in two separate but related decisions.

The first was the Knesset's first reading of the Referendum Bill regarding the Golan. In a move that had been discussed in opposition circles for several months, a special majority was called for in the forthcoming referendum. The determining majority would not be of those actually voting in the referendum, but of registered voters. In other words, voters who choose to abstain in the vote, or non-resident Israelis, could decide the referendum vote.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

In spite of its claims to the contrary, the opposition had a dual agenda in this bill. The first was a desire to defeat a referendum on the Israel-Syria treaty (yet to be concluded), which they believe may well get a simple majority among those who vote on referendum day.

The second, and more insidious, was the desire to guarantee a "Jewish majority" and to discount the Arab votes for the referendum. Since the assumption was that Israeli Arab citizens would vote in favour of peace with Syria and its consequence – withdrawal from all or part of the Golan – a majority of registered voters would mean that the Arab votes could be neutralized. None of the Likud's protestations could mask the discriminatory nature of the measure.

Just as serious in terms of the norms of government was the fact that three of the government parties – Shas, the National Religious Party, and Sharansky's Israel b'Aliyah party – all voted in favour of the bill, against their own coalition. These three parties want to be in the government for the perks of power and to vote against it to strengthen their bargaining position. They know full well that while Barak can survive without any one of them, he cannot sustain a walkout by all three. The inside-outside game is not a novelty in the Byzantine world of Israeli politics, but in this last vote on a matter of key policy, it took a quantum leap.

The Referendum Bill may never make it through committee hearings and a third reading, but its very introduction marked a regression in the ongoing struggle for greater equality among Israeli citizens.

In sharp contrast, just one week later, the Supreme Court of Israel issued an unequivocal ruling on the question of the sale of public lands to Israeli Arab citizens. At issue was the right of Katzir, a communal settlement in the Galilee, to refuse to sell land to an Israeli Arab family. Katzir was established in 1982, on public land allocated by the state to the Jewish Agency. The Agency, which had been established in the pre-state era to encourage Jewish settlement of the land, has continued this practice and still limits the sale of its land to Jews.

The Court examined this case reluctantly. When originally confronted with the injunction last year, it virtually pleaded with the government to deal with the issue, on the grounds that it was politically explosive. When nothing was done, the Court was forced to rule. Predictably, the majority view found that as a democracy and as a Jewish state, Israel could not discriminate among its citizens on the grounds of religion and nationality in matters of land ownership. In recognition of the heightened historic sensitivities surrounding this issue in the State of Israel, Justice Aharon Barak wrote: "Today we are taking the first step in a sensitive and difficult journey. It is wise to proceed slowly, so that we do not stumble and fall."

Unfortunately, the Israeli political arena on all sides of the spectrum is characterized by actions that reflect political expediency rather than any consistent regard for principles and justice. In this case as in many others, the inability or unwillingness of the political echelon to deal with fundamental questions of rights and protection in the law has pushed the issue to the Supreme Court, acting as a High Court of Justice. This unusual role allows any citizen to petition the Court against actions of the state that may be in violation of basic rights. Ironically, if passed in further readings, the Referendum Bill itself may end up as the subject of such a court challenge.

Religion in public life

The American Republican primary contest between George Bush and John McCain, now seemingly over, offered much food for thought for anyone interested in the role of religion in politics. And that food had a decidedly sour taste.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

There is an irony at work here. The United States is formally a country where there is a so-called "separation of church and state." In theory, religion and politics should not intersect. In practice, what that means is that religious schools cannot directly receive public funds and public spaces should not include nativity scenes, giant menorahs, or any other religious symbol. Some American public schools have been asked to remove the ten commandments from their walls.

Yet no western society is as "religious" as the United States. This strange country is a bastion of individual freedom. It is home to the most hyper-modern hi-tech innovations. Yet, more than Canada and other western democracies, it is full of true believers, of church goers, of believers in the devil, in heaven, in hell, and so on.

The "culture wars" in the United States have meant that religious issues have nevertheless intruded into politics and what people call the "public square." This has meant two things. First, individual candidates find themselves in positions where their private religious convictions are matters of public interest. Some voters find this crucial.

Second, there is a trend towards politicizing issues which many people feel are private or moral concerns, in a nasty and partisan manner. The abortion issue is the most obvious case. Neither is good for democracy.

Many Americans and many Jews were shocked to discover the kinds of anti-Catholic rhetoric associated with the fundamentalist Christian Bob Jones University, where George Bush made a major campaign speech. They were also surprised to learn about the school's ban on interracial dating, since abandoned. Bush was not the first Republican to speak there and to try to curry the right-wing fundamentalist vote.

Just as shocking was McCain's effort to use that speech to label Bush, directly or indirectly as being a bigot or condoning anti-Catholic bigotry. Indeed, McCain's all out attack on conservative Christian leaders Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell pulled few punches, though McCain claimed he was attacking only such leaders and not average Christian conservatives.

In response, the Bush camp pointed out that Senator Warren Rudman, a prominent Jewish Republican and McCain supporter, had similarly attacked the Christian coalition in his book. So if Bush was an anti-Catholic bigot, maybe Rudman was an anti-fundamentalist bigot! Both subtle anti-Semitism, as well as the self-righteous charges and denials of anti-Semitism, became part of the stinking brew.

There are lessons here for Canadian politics and for Canadian Jews. It is possible that we are on the verge of a major realignment on the Canadian political scene. I cannot predict whether the transformation of the Reform party into a broader-based, populist right-of-centre movement with disaffected Progressive Conservatives, will take hold. Nor do I know whether Preston Manning or Stockwell Day or someone else will emerge – it will not be Joe Clark – as their leader.

While many of the Reform supporters are social conservatives, it has been a strength of Manning's leadership that these views have not dominated policy. His party has not been captured by the extreme right, and there is no visible evidence of religious bigotry directed at any religious or ethnic group. Manning has tried to make people of diverse backgrounds, including Jews, welcome. Reform's energies have been focused on economic and political concerns, and not on socially divisive "wedge issues" that can polarize both internal party politics as well as an entire political system.

On this particular issue, Reform or the new "Reform Plus" party has nothing to learn from the American Republicans. (They have even less to learn from Israeli parties.) To the extent possible, religion is best kept out of electoral politics.

Podeswa breaks through with latest film

Jeremy Podeswa was genuinely surprised when he won the Genie award, Canada's version of the Oscar, for best film director. "I didn't even think I was in the race," he confessed as he accepted his prize at this year's ceremony in Toronto on Jan. 30.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Podeswa's movie, The Five Senses, faced formidable competition – Istvan Szabo's Sunshine, which captured the best film award; Atom Egoyan's Felicia's Journey; Lea Pool's Emporte-moi; and, last but not least, David Cronenberg's eXistenZ.

"I felt like the new kid on the block," said Podeswa in an interview at his crowded, student-like apartment in the Annex district two weeks after his startling coup.

"It certainly meant a lot to me to be recognized in that field of directors. But I don't feel that I'm a better director or that my film was any better."

The Five Senses, which The National Post had described as "the dark horse to watch," is probably Podeswa's breakthrough film, the one which has catapulted him from relative obscurity to the cusp of prominence and which may yet concretely enhance his budding career.

Since his unexpected triumph, his phone has been ringing off the hook and his fax machine has been humming.

"A huge number of opportunities have opened up for me," said Podeswa, whom critic Katrina Onstad has called "a consummate craftsman, a major talent in international film who just happens to be Canadian."

Since January, there have been offers from near and abroad. "Some are interesting. Some are not. Right now, I'm figuring out the future."

But, as he pointed out, the sudden clamour for his services stems not only from the critical success of The Five Senses, a drama which turns on five characters in search of a significant and intimate human connection against the backdrop of the disapperarance of a child.

"A lot of people were interested in me after Eclipse," he explained, referring to his first feature, released in 1994. "They wanted to see what I could do after Eclipse. They had been tracking my career, and now they know what I'm capable of."

As a result of his first two features, Podeswa, 38 and single, has reached an important juncture in his life. "I'm at a point I wasn't always sure I'd reach. It's perfect, really."

Born and raised in Toronto, he is the son of Yidel, a painter, and Ruth, the executive director of Beth Sholom Synagogue. The Podeswas, a modern Orthodox couple, have two other children, Howard, a painter, and Debbie, an occupational therapist.

A "film nut" addicted to Hollywood movies, he was greatly influenced by his father. Yidel, a movie buff, introduced him to foreign films, which, to this day, influence his cinematic style.

As a youth, Podeswa attended two Jewish day schools, the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. He graduated in 1980.

He has words of praise for both schools. "They taught me good learning habits and academic skills, on top of giving me a strong Jewish background. I'm not Orthodox anymore, but once you grow up that way it's in the blood. My Jewish background is still an important part of me."

Fresh out of Grade 13, Podeswa enrolled in Ryerson's four-year film course, believing that he could combine his passion for movies with his interests in photography, art and literature.

He was a star pupil. One of his shorts, David Roche Talks To You About Love, was named best student film of the year, appeared at the Toronto International Film Festival and was bought by the Public Broadcasting System in the United States.

His second short, Nion, was nominated for a Genie.

After Ryerson, Podeswa studied for a year at the American Film Institute's Center for Advanced Film Studies in Los Angeles.

It was a worthwhile experience. "It demystified Hollywood," he said. "It broke down the wall between you and the industry, making you feel it was very accessible."

And, he added, it taught him not to be intimidated by the parade of producers and directors who addressed his classes. "Everyone is human."

Jeremy Podeswa

Podeswa's first feature, Eclipse, told the story of how a total solar eclipse affects the lives of 10 diverse and occasionally perverse people. Nominated for two Genies, it was presented at the Perspectives Canada series at the Toronto International Film Festival.

Eclipse, which cost less than $1 million, was sold to 20 countries and popped up at numerous film festivals around the world. He made it in association with Camelia Frieberg, his partner in Fire Dog Films and the producer of Egoyan's critically acclaimed Exotica.

By contrast, The Five Senses was made for under $5 million, a piddling sum by Hollywood standards. Sold to 40 countries, including Israel, it will open in the United States on May 19.

"Both films, considering their budgets, have been quite successful," said Podeswa, who has been promoting The Five Senses practically non-stop for the past 12 months.

Yet, as he openly admitted, the road to fame has been littered with potholes.

"There have been frustrating moments when I've asked myself whether I should be in this business."

These self-doubts, he mused, emerged from difficulties he encountered in raising funds for Eclipse. "I really wanted to make Eclipse, and I wouldn't let go. Nothing would dissuade me from doing it."

Podeswa, who has directed episodes of Traders and North of 60, was past 30 when he finished Eclipse, an age at which some directors are already rich and famous. But he professes to be unconcerned about this aspect of his career.

"Age deadlines don't mean anything. You work at your own pace. In the last few years, everything has gone according to clockwork."

Asked what he intends to do next, Podeswa disclosed that he has signed a contract to direct a CTV television film set in Alberta in the 1920s. "It's about a family and their secrets."

As well, Podeswa is negotiating to write and direct a feature based on a Canadian novel. He declined to be more specific.

He is also writing an original movie script whose working title is Grace. The plot revolves around three women from three different countries who discover a common link through a deceased man.

Podeswa, too, has just finished the first draft of Minus Time, a book whose rights he has purchased. Minus Time concerns the relationship between a young girl and her mother, an astronaut.

In short, Podeswa is not only busy, but on a roll.

Watch for him in the years ahead.

Whispers speak volumes

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Passover approaches and Jews around the world begin preparing their homes for the holiday. We are familiar with the prohibition against leavened goods, the ceremonies of the seder nights, as well as the beautiful theme of freedom that weaves through it all.

Our central text for Passover has become the Haggadah, which tells of the miraculous events that result in our exodus from Egypt. But it is the Torah text itself to which one should turn for the complete picture, and the subtle nuances, that ultimately define the Jewish concept of freedom.

In the book of Exodus we are told of Moses and Aaron's encounters with Pharaoh, as he is repeatedly told to send Israel out of Egypt.

Before the plagues begin, Moses gives Pharaoh a sign, a glimpse of God's presence, by changing his staff into a serpent. The text then portrays the sorcerers of Egypt as being able to replicate this sign by turning their own staffs into serpents. The Egyptian sorcerers accomplish this through "their incantations."

Is there a difference between what Moses has done and what the sorcerers have done?

Rashi, a commentator from the Middle Ages, describes how the sorcerers accomplish their trick. Through the use of a Hebrew synonym, Rashi is able to tie the word incantation to the word whisper.

The Egyptian sorcerers are whispering their charms and turning their staffs into serpents. At first glance it appears that Rashi is focusing on an irrelevant detail.

What difference does it make whether the sorcerers are whispering their words or are proclaiming them far and wide?

Yet it is this difference that speaks volumes.

When something is spoken of between people as a whisper it becomes a secret. Secrets are exclusionary – they are shared only with those deemed privileged enough.

Not everyone has access to the whisper – it is hidden information, it separates one person from another. Whispers cement class distinctions and build walls that create borders of communication.

There exists the hint of conspiracy within a whisper, and where there is conspiracy there is suspicion and mistrust.

Whether the content of the whisper is subversive or not, the appearance of subversion consumes the content. The medium becomes the message.

God's communication is never whispered. It is proclaimed for all to hear. The Torah describes every relationship God shares with humanity. Every communication is reported and we then comment and interpret every detail, every word, every letter.

Throughout Jewish history we have seen ourselves oppressed when the law of the land prohibited the practice of Judaism. It is only then that we resort to being Jewish in hiding. It is then we are enslaved.

Rashi's seemingly irrelevant point uncovers a crucial subtlety of the Jewish concept of freedom. It cannot be discussed in hushed tones – it must be proclaimed. It cannot be only for some but for all.

As we prepare for our seders we are told to invite anyone in need to share our meal. We sit together – the rich, the poor, the homeless, and we openly discuss God, history and family.

It is a time to loudly proclaim that we put our differences aside and celebrate our unity.

Passover is anything but a whisper.

Adar's the month of mirth

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Question: Why didn't the computerized shofar work on Rosh Hashanah?

Answer: The rabbi didn't buy enough RAM.

Oy!

Purim is behind us, but it's still the month of Adar, and according to tradition, this is the month in which we increase our happiness. That means it's time for my fourth annual look at Jewish humour on the Internet. But first, a disclaimer. I try to recommend sites that entertain, but on the Internet you never really know what you're going to come across. So be warned.

There are now dozens of sites devoted to Jewish humour. One of the best and largest compilations of jokes is Lori's Mishmash Jewish Humor [http://www.geocities.com/CollegePark/6174/h--jewis.html]. You'll find everything from Yiddish Proverbs ("You can't chew with somebody else's teeth") to events of the Jewish Olympics ("Bagel Toss and Naches Shlep").

Another site I enjoy belongs to Esther and Polly Fleagleman [http://www.gurlpages.com/nolabel/cookie4/fleagleman.html]. They have created a humorous site that reflects what seem to be two delightful lives. You'll find everything from recipes (Why say it with flowers when you can say it with brisket?) to The Art of Collecting Sweet-'n'Low (Collecting is not stealing! If there is more than they need, you are just doing a mitzvah so they shouldn't waste it!) The Fleaglemans claim to be sisters, but with names like Polly-Esther, hmmm.

Perhaps the best humour is rooted in reality. Richard Lederer proved that point when he compiled his Biblical Bloopers – actual mistakes made by young scholars from around the world [http://pw1.netcom.com/~rleder er/arcblpr.htm]. "The first five books of the Bible are Guinessis, Exodus, Laxatives, Deuteronomy and Numbers. Noah's wife was called Joan of Ark. Esau was a man who wrote fables and sold his copyright for a mess of potash. Moses made unleavened bread, which is bread made without any ingredients. The greatest miracle in the Bible is when Joshua told his son to stand still and he obeyed him."

With so many incredible Jewish comedians out there, where would you start if you wanted to honour them? How about Alan King? The National Foundation for Jewish Culture presented the actor/comedian/ boxer/Catskills tummler with its first Award in American Jewish Humor [http://www.jewishculture.org/1998/kingaward98.htm]. At the gala dinner, Elie Wiesel presented Alan King (né Irwin Alan Kniberg) with the prestigious award. Not one to shy away from any honour, King tells this story: "At a command performance, Queen Elizabeth said, 'How do you do, Mr. King?' and I replied, 'How do you do, Mrs. Queen?' "

Looking for more humour sites? There's Jewish.com [http://www.jewish.com/search/Arts_and_Culture/Humor/], the massive Jewish Communication Network Humor links [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Index.asp?ColumnID=62] and Harry Leichter's Jewish Humor Links [http://www.haruth.com/jhumorlink.htm].

You can't talk Jewish humour without talking Jewish food. David Bader has taken great strides in simplifying the religion with his Yo-Yo Diet Guide to the Jewish Holidays. [http://www.extremely.com/yoyodiet.html]. He postulates that the Jewish festivals are divided between days on which we must starve and days we must eat. For example: Chanukah – eat potato pancakes; Tenth of Tevet – do not eat potato pancakes; Tu b'Shvat – feast; Fast of Esther – fast; Purim – eat pastry; Passover – do not eat pastry; Shavuot – dairy feast (cheesecake and blintzes); Seventeenth of Tammuz – fast (definitely no cheesecake or blintzes).

That may sound concise but another wit has condensed the religion even further in the Short Summary of Every Jewish Holiday: [http://members.tripod.com/~jewishjokes/jhol-summary.htm]. They tried to kill us…We won… Let's eat!

Orthodox urged to reach out to rest of community

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The fact that Orthodoxy is in a position to examine itself critically is a sign of its maturity and vitality, say rabbis Maurice Lamm and Reuven Bulka.

The difficulty is to understand and deal with the problems that have come with that maturity, said the rabbis, who are both considered key spokespersons for centrist Orthodoxy.

The two men spoke recently at a program called Tradition and Modernity, which was held at Beth Jacob V'Anshe Dridz Congregation.

More than 300 people attended the lecture, which was sponsored by the synagogue and Mizrachi of Canada.

Rabbi Bulka is an author and the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa. Rabbi Lamm, a former spiritual leader of Beth Jacob Synagogue in Beverley Hills, is the author of the seminal books The Jewish Way in Death and Mourning and The Jewish Way in Love and Marriage.

There is more Torah learning than ever before, not only in Israel, but all over the world, Rabbi Lamm said. "North American prosperity lets us live in unequalled ease. Nations are even apologizing to us for [how they behaved towards us] 50 years ago."

However, he said, "we are living on the surface," facing skyrocketing intermarriage and a declining birthrate.

The Orthodox are the only group whose numbers will increase, said Rabbi Lamm, noting that Orthodox Jews have lower rates of divorce and intermarriage, and higher birth rates; and proportionately they have higher rates of aliyah, generosity to both Jewish and secular causes, and increasing representation in the professions.

So, he demanded, "what is so bad?"

What is happening, Rabbi Lamm said, is what happens "to those who triumph."

We have to give an accounting about what we are doing with the Jews who are not triumphant, to those who are anti-Israel or intermarried, he said.

"What we are doing is worse than nothing – we are reading them out of the community," he charged.

He quoted a "well-known rosh yeshiva" who claimed that there are only one million Jews in America, the Orthodox, and that the other 4½ million claimed in census statistics are not Jews.

"Who dares write off so many Jews? These are our brothers, and we don't treat brothers like that."

In fact, the rabbi said, to gasps from the audience, "We must stretch the Halachah to the utmost permissible limits to keep those Jews part of Am Yisrael."

They are not just casualties, he said. "They built hospitals, they built Israel, they founded organizations, they fought anti-Semitism. Their ancestors fought to be Jews."

Equally serious is "the splintering of the Orthodox community," he said. There is dissension between those who espouse different styles of dress, those who only study Torah and those who believe in also studying secular matters, "between the Gerer and and the Belzer Chassidim, between Rabbi Schach [of Shas] and Lubavitch."

There is a strong anti-modern Orthodox philosophy, Rabbi Lamm added.

As well, the Orthodox can "and have to" disagree with Reform, but must recognize that followers of Reform are trying to move closer to God.

Rabbi Bulka said that the time for the Orthodox to change is "when we don't have to act out of fear, or when we are on the edge of extinction."

The way to deal with the non-Orthodox world is not, he said, "by becoming more stringent, and less involved and concerned."

He criticized those who claim that talking to the non-Orthodox implies recognition of their ideology. "We must change our fundamental attitudes," said the rabbi, who himself is active in dialogue with the non-Orthodox community.

The Orthodox must also learn how, and accept the necessity of learning how to distinguish between "that which is good and bad in the world;" they must also stop justifying domestic abuse, the abuse of the get in divorce, and the abuse of the conversion process by "invoking the authoritarian view of the Bible."

They must also, he said, "learn to fight with derech eretz."

He urged "the grassroots" Orthodox – the ordinary, lay members of the community – to insist that the leadership take these matters into account.

The program was co-ordinated by Rabbi Jay Kelman, of Beth Jacob Synagogue, Ilana Kelman and Elliott Malamet.

TSO returns from Vienna

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The Toronto Symphony Orchestra is back from Vienna and concertmaster Jacques Israelievitch now feels that it is better to have gone and voiced concern than not to have gone at all.

When the symphony began each of its three concerts in Vienna's Musikverein, Israelievitch said, the audience was compelled to read a statement by TSO conductor, Jukka-Pekka Saraste.

Initially it was planned that each concert would have a different program. However, it was decided, after the musicians' protests over the trip to Vienna due to the inclusion of Joerg Haider's far-right Freedom Party in Austria's coalition government, that each program would begin with Leonard Bernstein's Meditation No. 1 from Mass.

To figure out what was going on, the audience was forced to look at their programs and read the statement signed by Saraste.

In response to "widespread extremism in language and ideology in Europe today," the statement explained that the TSO was beginning with the Bernstein piece, in order to take a stand against discrimination and racism.

The Bernstein piece was chosen, the statement said, because "Bernstein was an artist who tirelessly fought against intolerance and discrimination and, at the same time, somebody who loved Vienna and its people."

"These adjustments were very good," Israelievitch said.

As musicians, he said, they could build relationships where politicians could not.

"However, initially it was difficult to overcome the emotional side of being there. I felt that Haider was an anti-Semite who minimized the Holocaust."

Israelievitch, whose father's family and maternal grandfather were killed in Auschwitz, was born in Cannes, France, and grew up in Le Mans and Paris. In 1995, his musical achievements were recognized when he was knighted by the French government.

While in Vienna, Israelievitch went to see Simon Wiesenthal, who is now 91 years old.

"Wiesenthal, who is in very good shape, was quite talmudic in his responses to our questions about the symphony being in Vienna," Israelievitch said. "He didn't respond directly to our questions. Instead, he made two points quite clear.

"The first thing he said was 'Oh, you come from Canada. I've been invited several times to come to Canada. But I have not come because the Canadian government has done nothing to go after the Nazi criminals living in Canada.'

"Wiesenthal made it clear that we have problems in our own backyard," Israelievitch said.

"Then Wiesenthal noted that Haider wasn't particularly a Jewish problem, but a political one – the problem is about hate of a number of different ethnicities."

Israelievitch said it was important that the TSO went to Vienna because the response to the concerts was favourable. "We conveyed a message with our music."

The TSO performed in six cities – Stuttgart, Frankfurt, Cologne, Berlin, Budapest and Vienna. It was their first European tour in nine years.

Montreal rabbi raises questions about Haider visit support and establish credibility in North America," she said. "It was a last-ditch effort that failed."

Zalcman Howard did say that if Haider had shown up at the Holocaust Centre unannounced, he would not have been turned away. An "intermediary" for Haider, however, identified by Zalcman Howard as Montreal lawyer Brahm Campbell had called in advance.

"He was looking for a photo-op," she said of Haider. "That would have been an insult to Holocaust survivors. If Haider was looking for an education, he didn't have to come to Montreal to learn about the Holocaust, especially to a centre that is under renovation."

Zalcman Howard said she is still in the dark about why a group of Montreal Jews organized by Campbell met privately with Haider while he was here.

"They certainly do not represent the leadership of the Jewish community," she said. Although Campbell "cast a wide net" to find Jews who would meet Haider, she said most refused.

Rabbi Moses is not the only prominent Montreal Jew to publicly disagree with the community establishment on the Haider affair.

Campbell was revealing nothing more about the meeting between Haider and Jewish individuals while in Montreal. "There has not been any further contact as far as I know," he said.

He did, however, justify this break with the organized community's approach. "In Judaism, we are to transform enemies into friends, not transform friends into enemies…

"By meeting this guy, we are not apologizing for him. We just can't turn a blind eye and walk away. We need to find out more about him."

Campbell and another lawyer Aaron Pollack, a former Canada-Israel Committee chair who was among the group that met Haider, will take part in a panel discussion April 6 at Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue, in which they will explore how the Jewish community deals with the changing international landscape, including far-rightists like Haider.

Sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, they will be joined by history professors Gil Troy and Stephen Scheinberg, who is a B'nai Brith Canada official.

Teen launches Torah study group for peers

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Rebecca Hart's appetite for studying Torah was whetted when she toured Israel last July with a study group made up of students and faculty from diverse Jewish backgrounds.

In the fall, she set out to recreate this experience for a group of teenagers in Toronto by starting a text-study group for Jewish high school students representing the gamut of religious denominations in the Greater Toronto Area.

"For a lot of students who aren't a part of a day school, their Jewish education stops after their bar or bat mitzvah," Hart, 17, a Grade 12 student at North Toronto Collegiate Institute, told The CJN in an interview.

An alumna of the Downtown Jewish Community School at the Bloor JCC and a member of the First Narayever Congregation, Hart said she stopped her formal Jewish education a year after her bat mitzvah.

The new study group is led by local rabbis and educators from across the religious spectrum. The students in the program, which is supported by the Samuel Bronfman Foundation, meet at the Bathurst Jewish Centre Tuesday evenings at 7:30 p.m.

Rebecca Hart

Hart had previously travelled to Israel on a Bronfman Youth Fellowship in Israel for five weeks with 25 other North American students, and she was one of two Canadians on the tour last summer.

"That was my first experience looking at Jewish texts in a way that really moved me," she said. "I was able to really connect to Judaism."

The text study was enriched by the diversity of perspectives of the group members, she said.

When she returned to Toronto, she said she was determined to connect with local high school students in a similar way and "create a dialogue between students from different backgrounds."

She envisioned a group where students "bring something of themselves – both intellectual and spiritual – and [interpret text] through their own Jewish experience. They have different backgrounds and so they have different perspectives."

She started by contacting Rabbi Diane Cohler-Esses, a New York City-based Conservative rabbi who was on the Israel tour. Rabbi Cohler-Esses posted a notice on a rabbinical Web site.

Subsequently, two rabbis from Toronto – Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation and Rabbi Neal Loevinger of Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish learning – said they wanted to get involved, Hart said.

She noted that there are now eight other local rabbis and educators on the teaching roster: Rabbis Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Roy Tanenbaum, of Beth Tzedec Congregation; Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Kehillat Shaarei Torah Synagogue; Rabbi Michael Skobac of Jews for Judaism; Rabbi Yitzhak Feigenbaum of Ulpanot Orot; Alex Pomson and Rachael Turkienicz of York University; and Rabbi Howard Sacknovitz of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

So far, eight students have joined the group.

Hart said she found most of the students through e-mail.

A notice about the group was put in one of the newsletters the Bronfman foundation sends out to alumni, she explained. "The notice mentioned that I was starting an exciting new group.

"One of the past fellows, Shoshi Lockshin – she e-mailed me from a yeshiva in Jerusalem – said, 'I tried to start a group like that… [let me know] if I can help you in any way.'

"I wanted to involved the Orthodox Community. I e-mailed her back and she gave me the names of students and educators. She gave me two pages of Jewish educators to call. Through her giving me all these contacts, the world just opened up to me."

The educators all set their own topics for text study,which is conducted in Hebrew and English, Hart said. For instance, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl led the first class, which was on possessive and sacrificial love, and Rabbi Loevinger led a class on love as a spiritual value.

Hart said she feels grateful for all the help she has received. "I was probably nervous at the beginning and a bit intimidated. But people have been really supportive and excited about the group.

"The general feeling about having a serious study group for teenagers of diverse backgrounds is new for Toronto and perhaps something that Toronto has been lacking."

Kolel to launch new premises

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Kolel is celebrating the official opening of its new building.

TORONTO — Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning is celebrating its official opening with an all you can learn buffet.

An open house on April 9 from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., at Kolel's new building at 151 Eglinton Ave. W., will feature classes run by 18 rabbis from all denominations, a mezuzah hanging and a Torah dedication.

"This opening represents how special Toronto is for sustaining such an institution. We have a fertile and rich Jewish community," said Kolel director Rabbi Elyse Goldstein.

Kolel, she said, is a model "unto itself. We developed the mould. It is not a school, it is not a shul, it is not a seminary, and we do not give degrees. We do, however, have a little bit of each. We are all of those things, and none of those things."

The centre has been "cloned in New York, Rochester and Jerusalem, and now we are helping to start one in Baltimore. There are very few pluralistic, egalitarian, full-time adult education centres. This opening is also a thank you to the community that has sustained us," said Rabbi Goldstein.

The centre "moved into a real model of pluralism when we established the department of outreach, headed by Rabbi Neal Loevinger, a Conservative rabbi."

It has been remarkable, she said, to watch Kolel grow from an idea. "I was at a synagogue in Boston, and was about to sign a five-year-contract when I was approached. I shlepped my husband, two-year old and newborn here because I had such passion for the idea. I dropped all logical reasoning and followed my heart. My husband [Baruch Sienna, a Jewish educator and now, head of Kolel's department of interactive technology] also believed in it. We felt that the liberal community in Toronto could fill up such a centre."

Kolel started as a department of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, but in order to purchase the building, it became an independent organization, said Rabbi Goldstein. "It has been a paradigm shift; it represents our growing independence."

Preparing the building for its opening was a "real Jewish barnraising. A lot of people donated furniture, and many others called to see if we needed anything. We had people donate shelving, and someone gave us a 12-foot oak table.

"The barnraising aspect has been so meaningful. It shows that people believe in us. We've had to do a tremendous amount of fund-raising. It was a real stretch for us."

There is still an opportunity for someone to name the building, said Rabbi Goldstein.

Participants at the opening include rabbis Dow Marmur, Michael Dolgin, Aaron Flanzraich, Daniel Komito Gottlieb, Daveen Litwin, Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Edward Goldfarb, Paul Sidlofsky, Michal Shekel, Yael Splansky, Arthur Bielfeld, Jerry Steinberg, Lawrence Pinsker, Lawrence Englander, Michael Skobac, John Moscowitz and Roy Tanenbaum.

The opening will also feature the Ne'imot Singers, klezmer music, childcare and Judaic crafts, and tours of the new building.

NCJW AWARD: At a recent reception at Queen's Park, National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section, was honoured among the finalists for outstanding services in the delivery of seniors programming and education – Canadian life and learning, for the Donner Foundation awards of excellence. Seen (from left) are Sheila Mostyn, Toronto section president; Lt.-Gov. Hilary Weston, Janice Landy, executive vice-president; and Terry Winston, executive director.

It's called the beStent. Used to open clogged arteries, this lifesaving device was developed by Professor Rafael Beyar of Technion's Faculty of Medicine. Stent placement, explains Beyar, treats complex coronary diseases that would otherwise require bypass heart surgery. Approved for use in Israel, Europe and Canada and soon in the United States, the beStent has now been successfully used in hundreds of thousands of patients. This beStent technology is just one of many breakthrough ideas to come from Technion – a leading global education and research centre in engineering, science, architecture and medicine disciplines.

Uri Zohar: From media star to Torah scholar

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — You would never guess that the man with the long beard, black hat and black suit once was a star in the Israeli entertainment world – the epitome of cool.

But that's just what Rabbi Uri Zohar used to be, before he turned his back on the glamour, immersed himself in Torah study, and emerged as a major figure in charedi kiruv.

He told his story to a packed sanctuary at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill, at a program sponsored by the synagogue adult education committee and P'Eylim Lev L'Achim, an organization that aims to bring Jewish families closer to Torah observance.

Rabbi Zohar, 65, grew up in a secular world, he said. "I didn't see a chumash until the fourth grade."

Jewish history, he was taught, began with the Zionists. Anything before that was primitive mythology.

He became an actor, a film director, a personality. He married and had three children.

Although he had money, travelled, and lived an exciting life, he wasn't happy. His marriage was falling apart – "I didn't know how to give her [his wife] love."

"Something was missing," he recognized, but he didn't know what it was.

Rabbi Zohar's moment of truth came when he, his wife and some equally secular friends attended a party to celebrate the birth of a daughter to a friend who had already, to their disdain, become observant.

"We came already laughing at the religious elements [of the event], he said. But it was there that he met a rabbi to whom, he says, "I owe my life."

An argument erupted between the rabbi and Rabbi Zohar and his friends.

He laughs now at "the chutzpah" of those who "didn't even know what a talmud chacham, a scholar, was," but hammered him with question after question.

The rabbi answered every attack "quietly, calmly."

With one sentence, "he changed my life," Rabbi Zohar remembered. He said that he could prove that there is a Creator who gave the Torah at Mount Sinai.

"This is the only question," Rabbi Zohar said. "If there is no HaShem, what's the point in anything?"

He arranged to see him, certain "that he would cheat, that all he would try to do was to make me do mitzvot."

Instead, he posed a question. The Torah, in the book of Leviticus, commands that Jews only eat animals with split hooves and that chew their cud. There are only four animals in the world, according to the Torah, that have only one of those two signs: the camel, the pig, the hare and the rabbit.

At the rabbi's insistence, Rabbi Zohar called a prominent (secular) zoologist. To his shock, the zoologist said that that was correct.

"How did Moses 3,000 years ago know that?" the rabbi demanded.

It took a satellite to measure the exact time it takes the moon to revolve around the earth. "The Talmud says [correctly] it takes 29 days, 12 hours, and 793 parts of a second. How could they know?"

Remembering that he felt as if "the whole Mt. Sinai fell on me," the then 40 year old decided to keep just one mitzvah, lighting the Shabbat candles with a bracha.

From that, he went on to accept more commandments – to keep Shabbat and kashruth, to observe the laws of family purity, to wear tfillin.

Eventually, he and his wife sold their luxurious home in Jaffa, and moved to Jerusalem. After 10 years, he emerged, an Orthodox rabbi.

"This is not just my story," he said. "A survey in the newspaper Yediot Achronot said that in the last six years, more than half a million people became baalei tshuvah."

P'Eylim Lev L'Achim, for whom he works, has embarked on an ambitious campaign to persuade non-Orthodox Jews to send their children to Torah schools, as well as to provide schools, supplies and staff to serve them.

Volunteers go door to door convincing parents to send their youngsters to religious schools, and making sure that the integration goes well.

Rabbi Zohar's appearance was part of an international fund-raising drive for the organization's work.

Russian Jewish Congress head meets Canadian counterparts

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, recently played host to the president of the Russian Jewish Congress, Vladimir Goussinsky.

Vladimir Goussinsky

An international media entrepreneur and industrialist, Goussinsky stopped briefly in Toronto to address a recent CJC regional executive meeting, before continuing on to New York City.

Goussinsky is also a vice-president of the World Jewish Congress and serves, with Canadian Albert Reichmann, as co-chair of the Union of Jewish Religious Communities of Eastern Europe.

Goussinsky discussed issues ranging from Russia's political infrastructure to daily life there. He also touched on the activity of Hebrew-Christian missionaries in his country.

"We discussed a wide variety of issues facing our two communities and the ways in which we may work together," said CJC national president Moshe Ronen. "We spoke about the realities and difficulties currently facing Russia's Jewish community and its relationship with the current government, the challenges facing Jewish Russian immigrants to Canada and the role of our respective Jewish communities in international matters and foreign affairs."

Among those who attended a reception prior to the executive meeting were CJC Ontario region chair Keith Landy; UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto president Alan Sandler; Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, CJC Ontario region vice-chair Esther Bem; CJC official Les Scheinenger; and business executives Leslie Dan and Philip Reichmann.

Former Jewish Standard publisher/editor dies at 92

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Julius Hayman, publisher and editor of the Jewish Standard for 63 years, died in his apartment on Bathurst Street, Sunday, March 5. He was 92 years old.

"He died at his desk, working as usual," said his son, Michael, who learned of his father's death while he was on holiday in Cairo with his wife, after they had attended a Jewish media conference in Israel.

Obituary

The funeral service, held at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel March 10, had to be delayed until Michael returned to Toronto. Burial was in Beth Tzedec cemetery.

Prior to his death, Julius Hayman was still working for the Standard, writing the occasional editorial and the column, World in Review, under the nom de plume of Joel Lightstone.

"At 92, he was just learning to use a com-computer," his son said.

Born in Calder, Sask., Hayman was one of four brothers and a sister who worked in his grandfather's store in the town.

Only one brother, Ben, 95, who lived with Julius, is still alive. But it was only this year that their brother Max, who was 91, died in California. Another brother, Leo, died 10 years ago. A sister, Pearl Kassler, also predeceased Hayman in Los Angeles.

Although he graduated in law from the University of Manitoba, Hayman never practised, opting instead for journalism, beginning with his interest in the university's publication, The Manitoban.

"He followed my mother, Sophie Freedman, to Toronto, (she predeceased him in 1991) and began working for the Standard, buying it in 1937," Michael said.

As president of the Zionist Organization of Canada, Hayman made more that 1,000 speeches in 30 years to raise funds for Zionist causes. He particularly liked to speak to Jewish groups in small communities.

"My father would like to be remembered as a person who promoted independent Anglo-Jewish journalism without benefit of any government or other grants," Michael said.

"He was fairly hawkish in his editorials as far as Israel is concerned, but he always said that matters of security should be decided by Israelis alone. On other matters, such as the Law of Return, he felt it was legitimate for those outside of Israel to express opinions."

He was the first Jew to sit on the Ontario Multicultural Committee.

Surviving Hayman are his son, Michael, and daughter-in-law, Patricia.

BBYO-JIAS chapter to integrate Russian teens

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Youth Organization and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services have joined forces to create a chapter for recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union (FSU).

One of the main goals is integration, said Dena Libman, director of development for BBYO. The recent arrivals will participate in programs with Toronto teenagers from other chapters and BBYO will work with both the Toronto and Russian teens to help them understand their cultural differences.

"I think there are a lot of stereotypes on both sides. By coming together with a common purpose – BBYO – these stereotypes will start to dissolve," Libman said.

Russian teens are sometimes stereotyped as aggressive, said Jenya Zukerfhteim, the BBYO advisor for the new chapter.

While stereotypes existed before the beating death of Matti Baranovski in November – Russian-Jewish young offenders were allegedly involved – this tragedy acted "like a trigger," Zukerfhteim said."After that, everyone started to speak about it – that there is something wrong with this community."

End to stereotypes

Zukerfhteim wants to organize a Russian culture evening to showcase Russian music and art, and to hold a round-table discussion between Russian and Canadian BBYO members.

"It is important for them [young Canadians] to know it's not just hooligans coming from Russia, but some very nice, intelligent people," she said.

In December, UJA FEDERATION approved grants for nine organizations to help integrate Russian Jews into the larger Jewish community. JIAS received $5,000 for its joint chapter with BBYO.

In January, JIAS sent Russian-language brochures about BBYO to parents of teens from the FSU. Social workers at JIAS used a list of clients they had worked with and called these parents to see if their children would be interested in joining the chapter, which is open to teenagers who have been in Canada less than three years and are between the ages of 14 and 16. The chapter now has 18 members.

Last month, the group had its first meeting and went bowling.

"It's a really nice environment. Everyone likes everyone. It's just pure fun," said Margarita Rapoport, 15.

Ola Irzak, another 15-year-old member, immigrated to Canada three years ago from Ramat Gan, but was born in Leningrad (now St. Petersburg). About 90 percent of the chapter's members are from the FSU, but have immigrated from Israel, said Zukerfhteim.

Irzak is hoping that joining the chapter will help her retain her knowledge of Hebrew and Russian.

"I'm afraid of losing the language," she said.

While the chapter's teens do not want to lose their Russian identity, they are open to Canadian culture, and want to become friends with Canadian teenagers, Zukerfhteim said.

"If they are able to create strong connections with Canadian youth, they will feel accepted."

For more information about BBYO's new chapter, call JIAS at 416-630-6481 or BBYO at 416-398-2004.

Coast to Coast

Why public esteem declines

The silly season is upon us. Jews have Purim, college students have spring break and parliamentarians have...Parliament!

Item: The Senate voted a 29 percent increase in its annual budget. The increase was necessary, argued the senators, because of extra work they have been doing in committee. Sounds reasonable until one considers that the Senate voted to extend their March break by an additional week because there was nothing for them to do.

Item: Arguing that the government's Clarity Bill is undemocratic, Bloc MPs have vowed to hold the House of Commons hostage while they plod through over 400 amendments to the Bill. The manoeuvre forced the House to cancel question period and a string of debates through much of the week. With MPs heading off for bed at 6 a.m. after almost 48 hours of non-stop voting, one wonders who is really in contempt of democracy.

Item: Jake Hoeppner, the Reform MP who was ousted from his caucus for various anti-Manning infractions, originally ran for the House on a "get-tough-with-crime" ticket. He has now been charged by the RCMP with assault and will go to court next month. The victim of his alleged infraction? Fellow MP Inky Mark.

The list goes on and on, but the central theme remains constant. Elected officials have two overriding responsibilities: to practise what they preach and to make the best possible use of the time they are in Parliament. Increasingly though, we see politicians betraying those two fundamental responsibilities. It is no wonder then, that the public's esteem for politicians continues to decline.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

MPs tell us that the overall number of calls received by their offices from constituents has dropped off substantially in the last couple of years. So have other forms of public contact with the political sector. Organizers of the upcoming Liberal convention have quietly admitted that registration levels are well below their original expectations – as were the numbers for the recent Canadian Alliance convention.

Given the ever-widening gap between politicians and their constituents, it seems to this observer that there was never a better opportunity for the Jewish community to make inroads in the political sector – at every level and in every capacity.

One could even be so bold as to suggest that some of the national Jewish organizations should be steering their constituents towards a more active profile within Canadian political life.

Coalition for Older Adults gets approval

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With the approval of the proposed new Coalition for Older Adults, planning director Faye Rosenberg Cohen says that she is anxious to get started doing the actual planning.

Approved by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal at its recent board meeting, the creation of the coalition was the central recommendation of a report by a committee on aging.

Last summer, Federation/CJA established this committee to plan for the future needs of Jewish older adults in Winnipeg. The report points out that 25 percent of the Jewish community here is over 65, compared with about 15 percent of the Canadian Jewish community as a whole.

While that figure has remained stable for the last 10 years, the percentage of those over 75 has grown by 20 percent. The over 65 age group is expected to increase again when the baby boomers hit that age in 15 to 20 years.

The new coalition structure calls for an ongoing committee to plan for continuous improvement and regularly review progress and plans. The organization envisions that boards of all agencies serving older adults will meet several times a year to share information and strategize together.

Among the areas to be addressed are outreach – bringing social and recreational programs to new locations with large concentrations of Jewish seniors; transportation – increasing the use of taxi vouchers; and supportive housing for those who are no longer able to maintain themselves independently in their own homes.

There are also proposals for an occasional seniors newsletter and a brochure describing available services to be distributed to relevant households and service providers throughout the city.

York students win award for political diplomacy

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last month, York University student Ilana Keyes discovered how exhausting it can be to act as an international delegate.

Keyes attended the 46th annual model United Nations conference, and stayed awake late into the night writing resolutions and amendments, and meeting with delegates from other countries to discuss compromises. The third-year student averaged two hours of sleep per night.

Candice Teitlebaum

Keyes was one of 30 York University students who attended the four-day Harvard University-run conference in Boston along with students from across the globe.

The conference is an exercise which simulates the United Nations by having delegates negotiate, debate and form resolutions to global issues. Each university represents a country – York University represented the foreign policy of the United States – and each delegate was assigned to a committee.

Keyes and her partner, Alisa Hopkinson, also a third-year York University student, were part of the Commission on the Status of Women, which discussed the treatment of war crime rape victims.

The duo advocated better education including teaching civilians human rights, teaching peacekeepers to be sensitive to crimes like rape and introducing help centres for women in war-torn countries.

One of the pair's challenges was convincing the Third World nations to install emergency help centres for rape victims.

"They thought that this was imposing capitalist, American, western values, that that was going to infringe on their culture," she said.

The duo worked hard prior to the conference. They researched America's foreign policy for four weeks, learned about parliamentary procedure for four months and had meetings with York University international relations and women's studies professors to talk about their ideas and have them critiqued.

When the WTO agreed to it, Keyes was elated. "Without the funding, we were just talking garbage," she said.

But the pair's struggle to pass a resolution that strongly reflected the American perspective was not over yet.

As the end of the conference loomed closer, delegates began pushing for the passage of their own draft resolutions.

Eight resolutions were drafted of which three included the United States' perspective.

Only one resolution could pass and once a resolution is voted down, it's gone.

Things started getting ugly.

Countries began forming alliances to try to divert support from the United States.

Ilana Keyes

Russia, who had consistently rejected Japan's views, suddenly tried to form an alliance with that country.

Keyes and Hopkinson, realizing they were losing support, decided to work with Russia and Japan, while at the same time attempt to incorporate American ideas into the drafted resolution.

They ended up combining two of the most popular resolutions and forming a compromise with the two countries.

"We convinced them they needed our support," Keyes said. Many of Keyes' and Hopkinson's ideas were incorporated into the resolution.

The resolution included introducing emergency help centres for women in war-torn countries, ensuring staff in these help centres are sensitive to the country in which they are working, and measures to prevent war.

The judges analysing the delegates awarded Keyes and Hopkinson the prize of best delegate. Candice Teitlebaum, a fourth-year York University student, also won best delegate award for her participation in The Organization of American States.

In total, two best delegate and three honourable mention awards were given to York University delegates at the conference.

Teitlebaum's committee discussed how the Americas could strengthen democracy within their own countries and how to ensure an agreement on free trade would be reached before a 2005 deadline.

Delegates from Latin America and Canada wanted Cuba to enter into a free trade agreement with the Americas but the United States was opposed to the idea. The United States' true-life stance pitted Teitlebaum against all of the other countries. But somehow, she managed to hold her ground, a feat she believes won her the best delegate award.

"I really maintained my country's position. No matter what, I still kept pushing to convince them of my point of view. Basically, it was me against 33 other countries," she said.

Coast to Coast

Damage claim by former agunah may set precedent

Stephanie Bruker received a get from her ex-husband, Jason Marcovitz, in 1995, 14 years after their civil divorce in 1981, and only after numerous appeals from herself, rabbis and lawyers, according to court documents.

Her lawyer, Alan Stein, told the court that part of the settlement entailed both parties signing a consent in 1980 in which Marcovitz "obliged himself to appear before the rabbinical authorities in order to obtain the traditional religious get immediately upon the Decree Nisi of Divorce [the divorce decree from the court]."

Get withheld for 14 years

Bruker is seeking $200,000 each for the psychological damages of "having been restrained from going on with her life," from remarrying according to the Jewish faith and from having children; and $750,000 for "loss of consortium," defined as Bruker's having lost the opportunity to have "the love, affection and moral and financial support of a husband, and to have children in such a union." Bruker was 47 when Marcovitz gave her a get more than four years ago.

In her declaration, she cites two serious relationships with men, which might have led to marriage.

The couple was married in 1969 at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, a Conservative synagogue. They have two daughters, both adopted. It was she who left Marcovitz.

In 1995, Marcovitz went to court to contest his child support obligations. Bruker cited section 21.1 of the Divorce Act, passed in 1990, which allows a court to dismiss any civil proceedings brought by a spouse who refuses to grant a religious divorce. Superior Court judge Diane Marcelin upheld that section. Shortly afterward, Marcovitz initiated the get.

In his defence, Marcovitz, who is represented by lawyer Anne-France Goldwater, calls the claim "grossly exaggerated, highly hypothetical, and requests indirect damages which are impermissible in a claim of breach of contract." He alleges she is motivated by financial rather than religious reasons.

He claims that whenever he tried to arrange a get, she placed the condition that he pay her "extravagant 'damages.'" He proceeded to a get only after he was able to directly provide financial support for his children, rather than through Bruker. He also points out that Bruker is infertile.

Marcovitz admits he agreed to give the get during the civil divorce, but changed his mind "for reasons of conscience." Bruker's action is "unfounded in law, as it is not within the powers of the courts to enforce an action which constitutes a matter of conscience" and is "a breach of [Marcovitz's] freedom of religion and conscience."

He went for the get in 1995 as "a moral obligation, and not a legal one" because such an obligation is outside the purview of civil law, Goldwater says.

"In any event, it is only the beit din which can morally determine whether the defendant has respected or transgressed his religious obligations flowing from circumstances of the breakdown of the marriage and the agreement signed thereafter..."

In her notice to the attorney general of Canada, Goldwater contends that section 21.1 is discriminatory "insofar as it was legislated specifically and solely to provide civil remedies for adherents of certain sects of the Jewish faith, without regard for the religious barriers to divorce and remarriage that adherents of other religions may face."

The state, she argues, can only be concerned with permitting citizens to divorce and remarry civilly. "The legitimacy" of the Divorce Act is "predicated upon the strict respect of the separation of church and state."

The Canadian government, she said, would not, for example, interfere with Catholic dogma, which prevents millions of Canadians from divorcing and remarrying religiously.

"Freedom of religion includes the freedom to give or receive the get, and to refuse to do so, and to change one's mind, and none of this is for the court to assess, examine or punish," the notice states.

The section is discriminatory also because it "deprives(s) a class of citizens of their ordinary civil recourses, solely by reason of their religious affiliation."

Referring to this case, Goldwater maintains that, despite the signed agreement, the state cannot "impede them from changing their minds, and the state cannot coerce them, directly or indirectly, to fulfil what is, in its pith and substance, a religious undertaking."

Moreover, under Jewish law, it is "impermissible to promise to give, or not give (or to receive, or not receive), a Jewish divorce... Consent to the divorce must be freely given before the rabbinical tribunal, without constraint of any kind, direct or indirect," she continues.

Claims provision unconstitutional

As long as section 21.1 remains on the books, "the door has been opened to consider all matters relating to the religious Jewish divorce as justiciable."

Goldwater concludes that it is unconstitutional for the state to intervene in matters of religious faith " to 'protect' the adherents of such religious faith from aspects of the faith which they do not accept...," pointing to the fact that the amendment was made after "Jewish lobby groups" requested it.

These groups, she says, asked for the legislation because "rabbinical authorities feel powerless in our secular society to assert and enforce their authority. This is not a justification for state intervention," according to Goldwater.

Israelis, Palestinians take steps for peace

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — After a month of deadlock and mutual recriminations, the Israeli-Palestinian track is again showing distinct signs of life.

Days before the scheduled resumption of talks in the United States, Israel's cabinet approved the transfer of an additional 6.1 percent of the West Bank to Palestinian control.

The cabinet decision took place amid repeated indications that the Palestinian Authority is co-operating with Israel to clamp down on terrorism.

Over the weekend, Palestinian security officials detained several Hamas activists in the Gaza Strip who were suspected of planning to carry out terror attacks against Israel.

The officials also uncovered some 70 pounds of explosives hidden in a kindergarten in a Gaza refugee camp.

One of two Hamas activists Palestinian security forces detained last week near the West Bank town of Nablus led these forces to the explosives.

The two suspects are believed to have headed a Hamas terrorist cell that Israeli security forces uncovered earlier this month in the Israeli Arab town of Taibe. The two had been on the run since a March 2 shootout in Taibe, where members of an Israeli anti-terror squad killed four Hamas members and captured another.

Last Sunday's 16-6 cabinet vote came after the inner security cabinet, a smaller group of ministers that focuses on security issues, approved the withdrawal map specifying the 6.1 percent land transfer.

The ministers who voted against the move included members of the pro-settler National Religious Party, the haredi Shas party and the Russian immigrant Yisrael b'Aliyah party.

The Prime Minister's Office said the redeployment, originally slated to be carried out in January, would likely take place on March 21 – the same day that Israeli and Palestinian negotiators were scheduled to meet at a Washington military base.

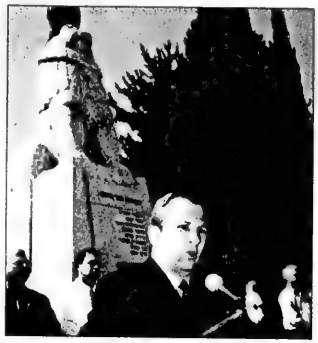
Under the withdrawal plan, 5.1 percent of the West Bank now under Palestinian civilian control and Israeli security control will be handed over to full Palestinian control. An additional one percent will go from full Israeli control to full Palestinian control.

As a result of the handover, the Palestinian Authority will have full or partial control over 39.8 percent of the West Bank, Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh said.

Sixty percent of the West Bank's Palestinian population "will be under full Palestinian authority" after the latest withdrawal, he added.

The withdrawal will include three Arab villages near Jerusalem – Zatara, Beitunia and Ubeidiya. It will also include areas near the West Bank towns of Jericho, Jenin Bethlehem and Hebron, bringing the Palestinians one step closer to achieving the territorial contiguity they want in a future state.

Prior to the cabinet vote, Jewish settlers lined a highway near Jerusalem to protest the redeployment.



Prime Minister Ehud Barak speaks at the 80th anniversary of the battle of Tel Hai last week. [Israel Sun photo]

The Palestinian Authority had rejected the redeployment maps that Israel originally submitted, claiming they did not include any densely populated Arab areas.

The Palestinians were particularly interested in areas near Jerusalem, where they want to establish the capital of a future state.

This demand triggered vigorous opposition from hawks, both in the opposition and within prime misnister Ehud Barak's governing coalition, on the grounds it would endanger Jewish areas and lead to the division of the city.

This pressure was attributed to Barak's decision last week to reverse himself and not include Anata, a West Bank village on Jerusalem's fringes, in the latest redeployment.

The decision angered dovish members of Barak's cabinet, who said Anata was never part of Jerusalem and criticized the prime minister for capitulating to pressure from the right.

When Barak initially indicated that he planned to transfer control of Anata and two other villages near Jerusalem, Israeli hardliners, including Interior Minister Natan Sharansky, flocked to Jewish settlements near Jerusalem to show their opposition to the plan.

In addition, Dayanim said, few Iranian lawyers were willing to take the case because most Iranians believe the defendants are guilty.

Advocates for the 13, who have been hoping the defendants would receive a fair trial open to foreign observers and the media, consider the judge's latest move an ominous development.

"We are dismayed not only by this cynical manoeuvre, but by what it bodes for the trial," Lauder said.

Many believe the arrest of the 13 is part of a larger struggle between reformers and hard-liners in the Iranian government.

Although reformist forces won an overwhelming victory in Iran's Feb. 18 parliamentary elections, hard-liners still control the judiciary.

Even before learning of the judge's decision regarding the retainers, American advocates for the 13 were urging President Bill Clinton not to lift an embargo on Iranian pistachios and carpets, a move his government announced last week as a way of expressing support for the Iranian reformers.

In a related development, a group of European rabbis urged their countries' governments to pressure Iran to free the 13.

"We are urging European governments to take a strong stand," British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks said last week.

PA plans to politicize Pope's visit to refugee camp

By DAVID BEDEIN
Special to The CJN

The Palestinian Authority and the Roman Catholic Church's Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem and Bethlehem are planning to politicize the Pope's March 21 visit to the UN refugee camp of Deheishe, just south of Bethlehem.

The Pope's intention in his visit to the camp is rooted in his genuine identification with any and all human suffering.

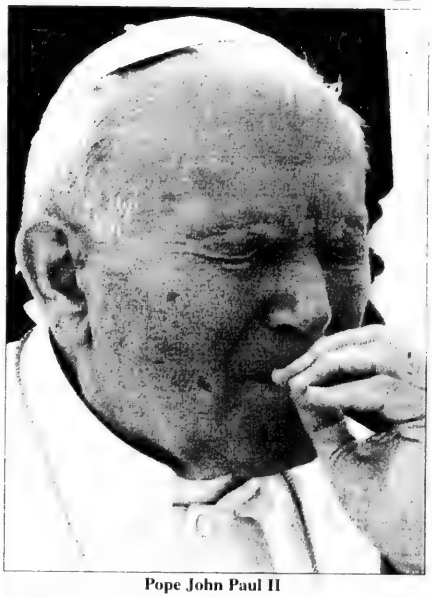
Analysis

However, Palestinian affairs correspondent Danny Rubenstein of Ha'aretz has written extensive reports on how Michele Sabbah, the Catholic Church's Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem and Bethlehem, in coordination with Yasser Arafat and the PA, has organized buses to transport thousands of Arab refugees to a rally in the presence of the Pope that will call for the "right of return."

Indeed, the PA has erected a three-storey monument outside of Deheishe in the shape of the full map of Palestine and dubbed it the "Palestinian Yad Vashem," to equate the plight of Palestinian Arab refugees with that of Jews who were murdered during World War II.

It is no coincidence that the Pope will visit the real Yad Vashem the next day.

The demand that Arab refugees return to their 1948 villages accords with UN Resolution 194 that has confined 3.5 million Arab refugee camps to "temporary shelters" for the past 52 years. The resolution operates under the premise and the promise of their "inalienable right of return" to villages that have been supplanted by Tel Aviv, Tzfat, Haifa, Ashkelon and more than 200 kibbutzim and moshavim.



Pope John Paul II

During the mid-1980s, the Catholic Relief Agency helped to construct more than 1,300 residences on a hill near Nablus as homes for Arab refugees. The homes stand empty because of a 1985 UN resolution that forbids Israel from moving Arab refugees out of their temporary shelters, since this would violate their "inalienable right of return" to the homes they left in 1948. The UN placed guards at the foot of the hill to prevent these homes from being taken by UN refugee camp residents.

Israel hoped that with the peace process, the PA would absorb the refugees in their state-in-the-making.

Instead, the PA's first act of legislation in 1994 declared that UN refugee camp residents must be absorbed in the pre-1967 boundaries of the State of Israel, and that the PA would deny any assistance to the UN camps to help them in the improvement of their deteriorating housing. The Palestinian Liberation Army has meanwhile established bases in each of the UN Arab refugee camps to prepare refugee residents to take back their homes by force, if necessary.

These preparations have been made with the logistical support and encouragement of the PA and the Latin Patriarch.

The campaign for the Palestinian Arab refugees to return to their homes will be launched in the presence of the Pope in an attempt to convey the impression of sacred Papal endorsement for the Palestinian Arab program for the "right of return."

In short, a genuine Papal pilgrimage that was planned to express deepest empathy for human suffering will be used by Sabbah and Arafat to advocate the dismemberment of the State of Israel.

Trial ends with claim of Jewish conspiracy

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — David Irving told the High Court in London last week that some of the world's largest Jewish organizations are involved in an international conspiracy against him.

The self-described Holocaust revisionist's claim last week was the centrepiece of his 104-page closing address at the end of a two-month libel case against American Holocaust historian, Deborah Lipstadt, and her British publisher, Penguin Books.

Irving has alleged that his reputation was damaged and his career wrecked by Lipstadt's 1994 book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, which, he claims, depicted him as a Holocaust denier who distorts historical data to suit his own ideological goals.

The trial, which has attracted international attention, has been described as the most important trial involving the Holocaust since Adolf Eichmann, the chief engineer of the Holocaust, was convicted in Israel in 1961.

A ruling is expected to be delivered in about four weeks.

The plaintiff and defendant have shown sharply contrasting styles. Irving served as his own attorney and appeared to relish the spotlight; Lipstadt, a professor at Emory University in Atlanta, has sat silently throughout the proceedings.

Deborah Lipstadt

Asserting that Israeli Holocaust specialist Yehuda Bauer paid for and directed Lipstadt's book, Irving alleged that Bauer urged Lipstadt to incriminate him.

The book, Irving said, is part of a 30-year international campaign, led by the Anti-Defamation League, the American Jewish Committee, the Simon Wiesenthal Center, JTA, the Board of Deputies of British Jews and others, which had aimed to discredit him.

"It is quite evident that the ADL, in cahoots with Lipstadt, set itself the task of destroying my career," he said, asserting that "the real defendants in this case are not represented in this court."

But, he added, "We have them to thank for the spectacle that has been presented in this courtroom since January."

Without their financial assistance, he said, it is doubtful whether the expensive defence team could have "mounted this colossal assault on my name."

As a result of their campaign, he continued, Germany, Austria, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have banned him.

Irving has represented himself – in sharp contrast to the large legal team defending Lipstadt – and he claimed that the defence case had cost some $6 million and at least 20 combined years of research.

"This blinding and expensive spotlight has been focused on the narrowest of issues," he said, "yet it has still generated more noise than illumination."

Irving was particularly scathing about JTA. He claimed the news agency provided material in 1992 for Lipstadt's assertion that Irving was to have participated in a gathering in Sweden, which was later cancelled, that would have been a "confluence between anti-Israel, anti-Semitic and Holocaust denial forces."

Among others who Lipstadt said were scheduled to attend the conference were Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan, Holocaust revisionists, representatives of the Islamic fundamentalist groups Hezbollah and Hamas, and the ultranationalist Russian group Pamyat.

David Irving

Irving also claimed that a 1995 JTA report accused him of "having supplied the trigger mechanism for the Oklahoma City bomb.

"That item," Irving told the court, "was picked up by the American, and then faintly echoed by the British press. It was only months later that I found out who had started that lie."

In his 24-page closing address, defence lawyer, Richard Rampton, declared that the trial had exposed Irving's views as a "fraud."

Irving based his claim that Auschwitz was not a death camp on psuedo-scientific research, said Rampton. He noted that Irving has never travelled to Auschwitz to examine the archeological remains or the documentary evidence in its archive.

"It follows that some other reason must be sought to explain his devotion over many years to the bizarre idea that no significant numbers of people were murdered in the homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz/Birkenau," said Rampton.

The reasons, he continued, were not hard to find: "As the evidence in this court has shown," he said, "Irving is a right-wing extremist, a racist, and, in particular, a rabid anti-Semite."

Whether anti-Semitism led him to become a Hitler apologist or vice versa was unimportant, added Rampton.

"Whether they are taken together or individually, it is clear that they have led him to prostitute his reputation as a serious historian – spurious though it can now be seen to have been – for the sake of a bogus rehabilitation of Hitler and the dissemination of his virulent anti-Semitic propaganda."

It will not be an easy wait for either Lipstadt or Irving.

Author advises people to keep life simple

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Susan Stern has the secret to stress management: Keep life simple.

A public speaker and author of Awakening Your Life Skills (Capricorn Press), Stern says that people need to recognize that simplifying is the way to go.

Stern lives in a one-room apartment, buys her clothes in a thrift shop and does not own a car. "Money cannot buy health…and it won't buy love or friendship. If money is your guiding value, you might consider what you are giving up and what you are getting," she says.

"If you need an incentive [to simplify], consider the possibility of being forced to do so because of circumstances beyond your control. You might get downsized, you might get sick…the reality is that a lot of us will be facing one or both of these possibilities. Being able to face whatever life throws at you is one of the hallmarks of a happy, well-balanced life" – balance between the different spheres of your life, physical, mental, emotional, spiritual; and balance within each area.

Imagine each sphere as a spoke on a wheel, says Stern. "If they are different lengths, you have a wobbly wheel."

Stern says she wakes up each morning thankful "that I am in one piece, and thankful to be awake. Being grateful goes a long way to achieving happiness. I am grateful for being healthy, having a roof over my head, being a vegetarian and being able to exercise."

As a child survivor of the Holocaust, Stern says she is determined not to let social injustices happen again. "That is my legacy. I will not let injustices go."

She is a board member of Arts Toronto, a founding member of the Toronto Operetta Theatre and a board member of Out of the Cold. She has also been the chair of the arts and culture committee at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, a judge at Caravan, a member of the Holy Blossom Temple AIDS committee and a fund-raising co-chair at Congregation Darchei Noam.

Susan Stern

"I volunteer for causes that need support. My philosophy is that one must be for oneself and for others as well. Giving back to the community is what it is all about."

Having lived through World War II, she says, "I feel so lucky to have life. It is amazing that my parents started life over so many times. Their drive was unbelievable. Those are the kinds of things that people do not recognize when they talk of the effects of the Holocaust."

Help others, she says, but "help yourself as well. Identify your likes and dislikes, and concentrate on what brings you joy.

"Think of yourself as a vessel filled with a wonderful substance. If you pour it all out, you will be left with an empty vessel. If you keep on replenishing it, you will always be able to share with others."

Ultrasound can measure glucose levels

BEERSHEVA — Diabetics need to withdraw blood at least four times a day to ensure that insulin therapy is keeping their blood sugar at safe levels.

With novel ultrasound technology developed by researchers at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU) and Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) near Boston, the inconvenient and annoying pricking routine may become a thing of the past.

In an article published in the March issue of Nature Medicine, the collaborators report on a hand-held ultrasound device that they developed.

It powerfully amplifies the ability of skin to transport body-fluid components to its outer surface. A single, brief application of ultrasound to a small area of skin allows painless, repeated measurement of the blood sugar glucose over many hours, without resorting to the testing of blood samples.

The main authors of the article include Prof. Joseph Kost of the Department of Chemical Engineering at BGU, and Prof. Robert Langer of MIT.

According to Kost, scientists have long sought painless and convenient procedures to measure blood factors in a non-invasive – or minimally invasive manner. While various approaches have been devised, none are in routine clinical use.

In the reported initial clinical testing involving four healthy and seven volunteers with Type I diabetes, a small circle of skin was treated for two minutes with low frequency ultrasound. Glucose values were obtained with accuracy comparable to that of existing methodologies.

"The work we reported on," says Kost, "is preliminary, and we already have an improved ultrasound unit that requires only 30 seconds to treat the skin.

" Our goal is the development of a patch or watch-like device that would go on the treated skin and report constantly on blood-glucose levels.

"We can even provide an alarm that would alert the patient if his sugar were too high or low, in which case he would take the appropriate action to avoid insulin shock or hyperglycemic damage.

"Since ultrasound can also be used to aid the delivery of insulin, we would like to design a device that measures glucose through the skin and automatically delivers the correct amount of insulin required by the patient."

The application of ultrasound to enhance transport of materials through biological and other membranes was first discovered by Kost and Langer in the early 1980s.

For the past 18 years, the MIT and BGU researchers have investigated various uses of ultrasound and polymers, particularly for drug delivery systems and diagnostics.

For more information about this project or other BGU research activities, please call Claire Horowitz at 416-665-8054.

Help for those with memory loss

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new support for the increasing number of people with memory loss is on its way.

For eight weeks beginning Monday, April 17, a support group for eight to 10 people, will be held at Circle of Care, a non-profit agency at 530 Wilson Ave. at the corner of Faywood Avenue.

"We felt there was a gap that was not being filled," said Marilyn Gruneir, supervisor of social work and intake services.

The group is being sponsored by Circle of Care and COTA Comprehensive and Mental Health Services, with Gruneir and Pamela Goldsilver, an occupational therapist with COTA, as facilitators.

In the past, when such groups have been held by Circle of Care, 75 to 80 percent of the people attending have been Jewish, Gruneir said.

The memory loss problem is becoming more acute in Toronto, with the latest survey indicating that 20,000 people in the area suffer from some form of dementia.

Although Alzheimer's disease is the form of dementia most people are aware of, Gruneir stressed that the group is open to people of all ages who have any form of irreversible dementia and have insight awareness and a willingness to discuss it in a group setting.

"People are being diagnosed at an earlier age with memory loss and are wondering where they can go for help," she said.

Circle of Care and its predecessor, Senior Care, have had five such groups in the past. In their evaluations, people attending have said the programs have helped them.

A personal interview will be held with all those applying. The fee is $25 per person; subsidies are available. Transportation is also available from Circle of Care for those who have no other means of attending.

The sessions are held from 10.30 to 11.45 a.m. to minimize rush hour traffic problems.

For information, call Gruneir at 416-635-2860, ext. 466.

Leadership Sinai Ball Features Hoax Couture

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

The buzz at Hoax Couture on Cumberland Street in Toronto is quite stirring, with everyone getting their designs in order, to set the stage for a spectacular fashion show that will delight the guests at the second annual Leadership Sinai Ball.

Thirteen years ago, Chris Tyrell and Jim Searle teamed up to create a distinctive look defined by unusual but luxurious fabrics, great cut and flattering fit with an aggressively fashion-forward feel.

Today they are the artists behind Hoax Couture, and their timeless designs adorn such celebrities as singers Allanah Myles, Lauryn Hill, basketball star Dennis Rodman, and actors Will Smith and Jason Patric.

Readers of the Toronto weekly Now, recently voted the duo as best local fashion designers. Tyrell and Searle adhere to an upbeat and fun fashion philosophy under which even serious suiting has novel twists.

Hoax Couture Men's and Women's wear now sell in shops in Canada, the United States, Denmark and England.

These gorgeous party frocks have lots of ruffles and sheer transparent layers of organza and chiffon. Delicious colours of soft pink, green and many shades of blue predominate.

The Sinai Ball runway will feature men's suits with three-quarter and full-length jackets – yes, right to the floor! Shirts and ties will be tone on tone – very unique and I must say, very sexy.

Hoax Couture design.

The Leadership Sinai Ball takes place April 1 at the Royal Ontario Museum. This year's theme is Cool Fool. Much Music's Juliet Powell joins radio personality, Rob Christie, and CFTO's Alicia Kay for the evening which includes prizes and a silent auction.

The age group targeted will be somewhere between 25 and 45. Lots of fun for singles – so be cool, creative, colourful and wear your coolest shades.

HSBC Bank is sponsoring the ball which will support Mount Sinai programs in patient care, teaching, and research for the Best Medicine Campaign. The funds will also contribute to the building of the new Leadership Sinai Centre for diabetes at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Tickets are $50 or you can order a raffle ticket for $10, which gives you a chance of winning a Cartier gift. For tickets call Mount Sinai Hospital at 416-586-8409. For more information call Michelle Levy 416-482-0577.

Wool sweaters are a worthwhile investment

By ELAINE COHEN
Special to The CJN

For years, Canadians have bundled up in sweaters to guard against chilly breezes and high-powered air conditioning systems.

Thanks to modern technology, wool has assumed a permanent place in fashion circles throughout the year. Now, wool garments are light, easy to care for and retain their shape.

Whether someone turns up the air conditioning at the office or you take an early morning stroll, a sweater comes in handy.

Perhaps that is why twin sweater sets were welcomed back in the '90s and they are still going strong. Modern women on-the-go appreciate the functional and aesthetic qualities of this fashion hit of the '50s. The versatile short-sleeved crew neck sweater teamed with a matching long-sleeved cardigan complements slacks, skirts, and suits.

Consumers have always had the option of hand laundering or professional dry cleaning; machine washing and drying is not recommended.

To avoid shrinkage and to retain the shape, manufacturers suggest hand washing in tepid water with mild detergent.

Knit won't wear out

"Never wring out the garment, simply blot out moisture and lay flat to dry," was the knitwear maven's mantra. Many advocates of this time-honoured solution, continue to practise it.

Montreal native, Ellen Grosweiner, a 67-year-old grandmother, still has a bottle green cashmere sweater her brother bought for her "sweet 16" birthday.

"It's a wee bit small on me now but that's because I've gained weight," says Grosweiner.

"People, today, make a big deal of hand washing but it really takes very little time and if you're gentle and the product is good, the knit won't wear out."

However, year 2000 techies prefer quick solutions, such as pressing the gentle cycle on the washing-machine knob. To meet consumer demands, Woolmark, Woolblendmark, Lycra and other registered firms have produced machine washable pure wool or wool blend products.

Woolmark has even taken the initiative to enlighten consumers through brochures on wool care and solutions for stain removal. Veteran consumers like Grosweiner will be happy to learn that age-old laundering care and stain removal tips are included with nuggets directed at the new millennium crowd.

Woolmark advises consumers to check the sew-in care label inside wool knitwear and to follow the instructions. These care instructions vary, according to the specific wool type, the way the yarn has been processed, and the technical treatments applied to give added benefits to the knitwear.

The symbols are your guide to the cleaning methods most appropriate to maintain the garment's appearance, texture and shape.

Now advanced technology has been developed which means that some Woolmark knitwear can be machine washed and even tumble dried at home.

"Check whether the care label in your knitwear carries the machine wash symbol," Woolmark advises. For best results, turn the garment inside out to protect any loose fibres on the surface. Do not pre-soak. Select the approved Woolmark program or the equivalent 40 degree C wool wash cycle on the washing machine.

This ensures that the garment will be washed at the right temperature using a much reduced mechanical action. Choose mild, bleach-free detergent.

Always dry flat. Line drying is not recommended. If a "swing ticket" is sewn on the garment, that means it's "Total Easy Care" knitwear. It can be machine washed using a gentle cycle and once the short spin is complete the specially treated knitwear may be tumble dried on the low heat setting.

Nothing is more annoying than going out to dinner and staining a brand new garment the first time it's worn.

Fortunately, stain-removal remedies solve the problem. Dealing with stains on wool knitwear requires swift action, Woolmark notes. "Fortunately, wool is one of nature's most forgiving fibres, thanks to its natural protective coating which makes each fibre resistant to dust and dirt."

Decide whether you have the confidence to treat the stain yourself or prefer to take the knitwear to a dry cleaner. Whichever way, when something is spilt on wool, you should first place a clean, dry, absorbent cloth over the affected area to soak up any residue.

Tattoos don't have to be permanent

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

Melanie Marcus, owner of Little Miss Henna Inc., wears henna to advertise her company but also sports the body art for personal reasons.

"It's safe, it's fun and it's temporary. One week, I can have a tattoo that is a sun and the following week, I can have a rose."

Henna is a plant whose leaves yield a dye which can be used to create designs on hands, feet, the back or other parts of the body.

In India, brides sometimes have their bodies, hands and feet painted for their wedding day. The Talmud mentions henna as a remedy for a disease of the urinary organs.

In the last two years, Marcus has noticed an increased interest in henna. Even Hollywood stars are wearing these designs, she said.

Jennifer Love Hewitt, the actress best known for her role as Sarah in the drama series Party of Five and the spinoff Time of Your Life had henna adorning her ankle in an issue of In Style magazine. This month's Cosmopolitan contains a photo of blonde actress Renée Zellweger, who starred opposite Tom Cruise in the movie Jerry Maguire, with a henna back tattoo that reads "Jimmy Gene" for Jim Carrey.

As more and more people have become aware of henna patterns, tastes have changed, Marcus says.

When she first began her business, girls were asking for little butterfly and flower designs. Now, Marcus has noticed that henna patterns in the form of anklets and bracelets are all the rage.

While boys used to ask for yin yang and Nike symbols, now she has noticed that celtic arm bands and suns are "in."

Marcus began her business two years ago and applies henna at corporate events, social gatherings, or individual appointments.

In December 1998, she decorated the hands of a Morrocan Jewish bride. The design included a big flower in the middle of both palms and fine, intricate lines, dots and spirals running down each finger. It took twenty minutes in total for her to decorate both hands with the delicate design using black henna.

When Marcus first became interested in the art of henna, she spoke with Sephardi Jews, Morrocan Jews and people of Indian descent.

One myth she was told about is that when brides are adorned with henna, it is believed that the darker the henna on the hands and feet, the stronger the love for the husband.

Marcus's technique of applying henna demands little time and minimal mess. She applies brown or black henna in a paste-like form from a bottle and it takes ten to fifteen minutes to dry. Then the henna crumbles or peels off and a tattoo remains underneath.

No dyes or colouring are added to the henna to make it black, Marcus said. In Egypt, a black rock is taken from the Nile River and sifted in with the henna leaves, she said.

The amount of time Marcus spends applying henna depends on the intricacy of the design. A small butterfly might only take 30 seconds to apply while a celtic arm band would take her at least two minutes or more.

The temporary body art lasts between a couple of days and two weeks, she said.

For more information on Little Miss Henna Inc., call 905-731-0067.

Melanie Marcus applies the finishing touch.

Designer Tryna is a real gem

By JOYCE SINGER D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

After struggling to find her own niche creatively, Tryna, a hot new talent on the fashion front, is thrilled that her artistic foray into jewelry design, is such a success.

Fans of her funky baubles include actress Jennifer Podemski, who wore them to the Gemini Awards, and pop sensation Lorraine Lawson, who sported them in her video If I Could.

Professionally known only by her first name, Tryna has been featured on various TV shows, including Images on the Life Channel. Although beading has long been popular among those who do crafts, Tryna's delicate-looking yet sturdy pieces combine intricate, original artwork, with high quality semi-precious stones, sterling silver and freshwater pearls.

For several years, Tryna was the cantor's secretary at Holy Blossom Temple. A self-taught artist, she says, "I've done retail, I've done secretarial, but I've always done something in the arts. I hand-painted clothing for a long time, and I did craft shows at Na'amat, and the Richmond Hill Country Club, etc., while working full time. I did murals in babies' rooms. I've hand-painted furniture.

"It's almost like I need to…I must have creativity in my life."

Five years ago, Tryna's husband, Shalom, suggested amalgamating their careers. At that time, he was importing trendy costume jewelry for such top clients as Shoppers Drug Mart. Because Tryna was brimming with her own artistic ideas, Shalom provided her with some beads to work with.

"We were doing trade shows, and I brought along a few of my items and actually sold a few pieces."

Tryna

After leaving Holy Blossom, she worked for the New Israel Fund for awhile. Then, about four years ago, "I was in a terrible car accident that took me out of work," she says. "I had serious whiplash and I had to go to physio every single day. I ended up losing my job. I never felt sorry for myself, because I believe everything happens for a reason. When I lost my job, I started to do this full time."

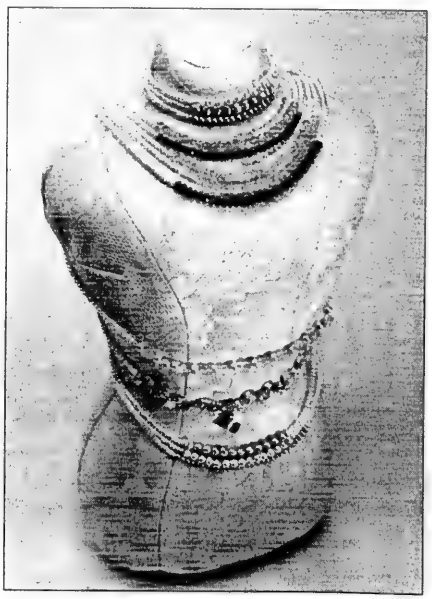
She's enterprising, and like most working moms, she's busy balancing work and family. Working mainly from home, Tryna and Shalom are able to keep tabs on their energetic 2½-year-old son, Jonah.

Tryna's high profile accounts include Holt Renfrew and many chic boutiques across North America, including Accessity in Toronto; the Shayne Gallerie in Montreal; the Theatre Store in Stratford; and Nicolina of New York. Happily, these days she is able to devote most of her time to her unique designs.

Her hard-earned success allows her to delegate her order filling to hand-picked assistants. Tryna still looks forward to the day she can travel directly to India, rather than New York, on buying sprees for the best quality Indian gems.

In the future she'd also love to expand to beaded accessories like bags or belts. Otherwise, it seems that everything she's ever hoped for professionally has come true.

Tryna has donated some of her jewelry to such charitable organizations as the Breast Cancer Research Fund and the Israel Cancer Research Fund – proving that she herself is a true gem.



Tryna's pieces contain stones, silver and pearls.

Book on cosmetic surgery has important information on procedure

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

One of the latest publications in the arena of cosmetic surgery is a book called Cosmetic Surgery: Are You Ready? This little, easy to read book is a helpful resource guide if you are considering a cosmetic procedure. Education and realistic expectations are the core of decision-making says the author, Wendy Levin.

Levin brings forth insightful information from her own "not-so-positive" personal experience and years of research. She did her master of education thesis on cosmetic surgery and has a reputation for providing current information and raising awareness in the cosmetic surgery industry.

She has also recently launched a new business called Cosmetic Confidence where she will provide men and women with myriad data on post and pre-operative surgery.

Cosmetic surgery is a vastly growing area of medical specialization, with thousands of dedicated practitioners helping patients regain confidence and pride in their faces and bodies. According to the Canadian Society for Cosmetic and Plastic Surgeons, cosmetic surgery has increased 30 percent since 1997.

Wendy Levin

However, getting-in-the-know is essential as these elective procedures can often carry with them potential for disappointment.

Choosing to make a surgical change on your body or face is a huge decision. Today, there are so many choices it is hard to know which method is best for you.

Sometimes a simple injectable like collagen, restilene or botox can create great results and delay a surgical procedure for a few years or perhaps forever, according to Levin.

Cosmetic Surgery: Are You Really Ready? is an easy-to-follow format that will provide you with important surgical decision-making information, such as:

- self assessment;
- Insights on realistic expectations;
- How to choose the best doctor for you;
- Three essential points on patient/doctor communication;
- The most commonly asked questions;
- Choosing the best procedure for you;
- Getting the results you want;
- Post-operative recovery – expectations and tips.

So, if you are in the throes of making a monumental decision or simply thinking about making a change in your appearance, Cosmetic Surgery: Are You Really Ready? would definitely be an interesting read.

Are you wearing the right bra?

Liliana Mann

Research shows that about 80 percent of women wear the wrong size or style of bra.

Liliana Mann, owner of Linea Intima, says to find the right bra it's important to take the correct measurements, then address individual figure concerns, lifestyle needs and personal style. The entire process can take anywear from 30 to 60 minutes and a thorough fitting shouldn't be rushed.

Even if someone is in the lucky 20 percent who wear the right size, Mann advises having a proper fitting once a year. "The breast is not a muscle, but delicate glandular tissue. It needs to be properly supported, especially as we age."

Mann maintains a proper fitting bra can help reduce back pain and headaches for large-breasted women and can improve posture, overall appearance and enhance self-esteem for all women.

Mann, who's been in the lingerie business for 18 years, believes that the right undergarment plays an important part in how clothes fit and look on the body.

Liliana Mann's bra-fitting tips

To achieve the proper fit:

1. The bra band should lie straight around the front and back of the body.
2. The centre of the bra should lie flat against the breastbone (including wires if any) and the bottom of the band should fit comfortably but not allow a finger to slip underneath easily.
3. The top of the bra should lie flat, separating the breasts.
4. The sides should lie smoothly without binding or cutting; if wired – wires shouldn't hurt.
5. The straps should support comfortably without slipping off or cutting into the shoulders.
6. The cups should fit smoothly without wrinkles or any overflow effect.
7. Put on the bra by bending forward and "wiggle" breasts into cups.

It's time for a fitting when:

1. You can't wait to take your bra off at night!
2. The wires hurt – the band is too small or the bra sits too low on the ribcage.
3. The wires poke on the side – a larger band or cup size is needed.
4. The middle front rides up away from the body – cups are too small.
5. The shoulders hurt – more support is needed (smaller band and larger cups); needs a style with wider or padded straps.
6. Straps fall off shoulders – they need to be tightened; they have lost their elasticity; shoulders may be sloped, requiring a bra with straps that are closer together at the back.
7. The band rides up – it's either too big or has lost elasticity.

A properly-fitted bra can help reduce back pain.

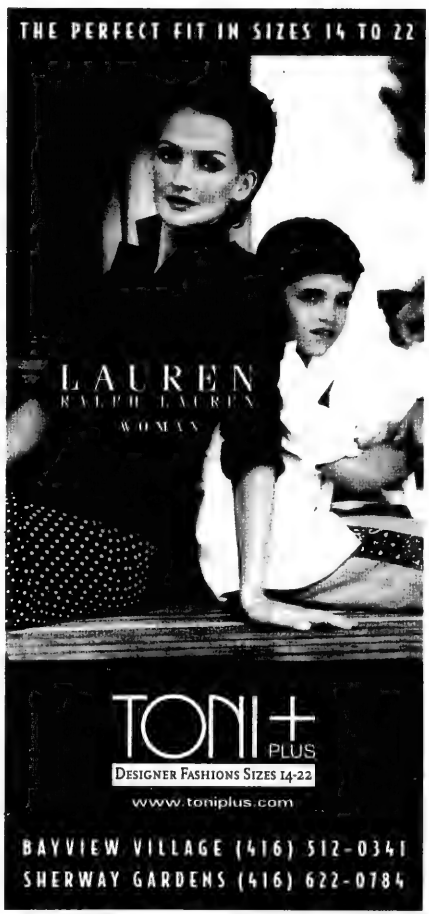
A history of the bra

Since 2000 BCE, women have been trying to improve and enhance their figures. The first bra was made in the 1920s by a Frenchwoman named Keston. It was no more than two handkerchiefs folded into triangles and attached with ribbon and buttons. It had no shape or suppórt, but it sold.

It wasn't until the 1930s that designers started to realize that breasts need to be shaped and supported. During this time, bras were made with cotton or rayon fabrics and ribbon straps.

Later, elastic was put through the sides and back to give extra support. The invention of Lycra by DuPont during the Second World War was the turning point for the lingerie industry. Undergarments that were lightweight, easy to care for and offered extra support became popular.

During the 1940s, bras evolved into styles that were similar to what we see on the market today.



Things to consider when shopping for clothes

Before we plunk down a bundle for a chic new ensemble, a lot of factors enter our minds. Will I get enough wear from this outfit to warrant the price? Does the material breathe? Is the fabric easy to wash? Will the style be in next year or is it a trendy number that will appear dated? Is the colour becoming? Will this outfit take me everywhere or will it have limited possibilities?

If you are designer-conscious, you may also question the designer label as well as the country where the garment is manufactured. Queried on the leading decision-influences when buying apparel, Cotton Incorporated's Lifestyle Monitor released the following information:

Price takes priority. Cleaning/care instructions and fibre content rank two and three respectively. Price, according to 52.4 percent of respondents, is the number one consideration when it comes to buying apparel, while 39.2 percent siad it was "somewhat important."

Among women, 57.8 percent said price was a very important consideration.

Women between 16 and 24, while not placing as heavy an emphasis on price as the total sample, nonetheless showed some concern for the price tag. Forty-four percent said price is the number one factor before buying.

According to Ady Gluck-Frankel, president of junior sportswear manufacturer Necessary Objects, young women expect to pay the same for clothes this year as last.

"She'll pay more for jewelry, music CDs and videos, but not clothes. That's a real challenge to us."

For the 16-24-year-old woman, 41.3 percent said the care instructions were very important. "In the springtime, clothes are generally made of fabrics that will be laundered, such as cotton, cotton/polyester blends, etc." said Bruce Rittner, vice-president of product research at Gerber Garment Technology. "That's where the quality issue comes in. And that's also where price may go to loggerheads with laundering concerns."

Rittner asserts consumers get what they pay for. "A $12.99 dress may not hold up as well in the wash as a better-constructed model," he said.

More than 34 percent of respondents said knowing the fibre content was very important when purchasing a garment, while a full 40 percent said it was somewhat important. As for the importance consumers placed on designer or manufacturers' labels only 10 percent of women said it was very important.

BEAUTY SHOP By Carol Wise

NEWSFLASH! She was painted by Salvador Dali, she lunched with Pablo Picasso, and she was internationally revered among the beauty cognoscenti – her name, Helena Rubenstein. Her gorgeous medley of makeup will once again adorn Canada's cosmetic world, delighting us not only with colour, but with skin care that works. This is truly the marriage of science and beauty. The renewal of this incredible collection is thrilling. Even the packaging is artform – like exquisite jewelry. Watch closely, as in the next couple of months, she will be in full view.

SPRING 2000

Makeup collectibles this spring are simply fabulous. An array of spectacular colours spring off palettes, creating sunshine for lips, eyes and cheeks. Colours sing and dance while your face leads the melody. Whether your look is sexy, fresh or whimsical, everything goes.

It is time to lighten up your skin care regime. Humidity returning to the atmosphere is truly a welcome addition, but you should be aware that you can now move from your rich creams to lotions, depending on your skin type.

Exfoliating your face and body will create that springtime glow. Turn your bathroom into a spa or go for a professional facial and body scrub. Treat yourself – it's spring.

Wearing sun block every day is the answer to keeping your skin protected from the sun. Skin damage occurs each time you are exposed to sunlight. Moisturizers and foundations often contain protection, so check them out. Bronzing gel or self-tanners work well if you want that sun-kissed look.

Lotions from Christian Dior.

Get into shape with a good exercise plan. Do 30 minutes of cardio at least three times a week. Every day do stretch and tone exercises for about 20 minutes, and if you are ambitious, lift some weights every other day. If you go for a walk, then walk. Strolling will do little for your waistline. Don't fool yourself if you want to see a difference – move.

CAROL'S TIPS

Skin Care: Elizabeth Arden launches four new sun products – three excellent self-tanners for face and body and a triple protection face block SPF30.

Estee Lauder comes forward this spring with Go Bronze Tinted Self-Tanner for Body – great on the legs and Bronze Booster Moisturizing Tan Builder – to help your tan last longer.

Christian Dior skin care.

Christian Dior's new skin care collection includes purifying cleansers, refreshing waters and gels, softening cleansing milk, creams and lotions, complete with an amazing exfoliating cream and cleansing mask. All products are injected with a hydra-vitamin complex designed for their specific purpose.

Biotherm introduces two star products: Draine Minceur Skin Firming Body Massage and Draine Up Lifteur Skin Firming Contouring Gel. The first refines, tones and smooths, while the later exerts a lifting and firming effect over the immediate skin surface – very nice.

Foundation: Swivel up foundation sticks seem to be popular this season. Clinique's New City Stick SPF 15 is fast and filled with nutrients. Use all over your face, as a cover-up or touch up. It's water, humidity and sweat resistant – beauty correction on the go. L'Oreal introduces Line Minimizing Powder and Eye Line Minimizing Concealer. These products not only cover imperfections, they claim to improve the quality of the skin.

Lancôme's Huile Pollen is a shimmering face and body oil. It's a non-greasy oil specked with golden pearl. This liquid gold in a bottle has a hydrating, no-transfer formula that leaves the skin silky and glowing with light – very seductive.

Light Shimmering Face Makeup from Lancaster bathes the skin in a sheer, luminous veil of pearly pink and gold. L'Oreal's On-the-Loose luminous powder for face and body in Peach Soleil highlights the skin ever so softly.

Bronze Goddess Soft Matte Bronzer, a jumbo-sized sleek powder compact from Estee Lauder has a unique oil-control complex that keeps you bronzed and shine free all day.

Sweet Cheeks: L'Oreal's Sunsign collection captures that sun-kissed look at three moments of the day. Try Quick Stick a Face and Body Blush that gleams in Sunrise, Sunny Honey and Twighlight Rose – morning, noon or night, you are gorgeous.

A silky cream-to-powder blush from Elizabeth Arden is a sheer wash of colour that you can apply lightly for a natural touch or increase the intensity for a more coloured cheek.

Quo's new Cheeky Blush slips on barely visible colour in blush pink – a matte counterpoint to all that glistens.

Create a "just pinched" look with Bobbi Brown ColorOption's Artstick. This is a two-in-one chunky pencil for both lips and cheeks – a great traveller. Bobbi Brown is available at Holt Renfrew.

Eye Candy: Estee Lauder's Playful colour collection for spring brings us a palette of citrus greens and sunshine yellows. Have some fun with two-in-one Eyeshadow Quaud – you will love it.

Le Regard Laque/Eye Lacquer is one of Chanel's more unique treats this season. It's a duo of glittering red and black shades intensified by an interesting ultra gloss effect. Define your eyes with Chanel's Ligne Extreme a luminous deep silver eye liner that is extremely easy to apply Exclusive to Lancaster are six dazzling cream-to-powder eye shadows packaged in a precision pen that delivers a velvety shadow – easy to apply and stays on all day.

Elizabeth Arden's Cream to Powder Eyeshadow Duos are exquisite, be sure to look at the pale green and cobalt.

Kissable Lips: Gorgeous mauve shades from Estee Lauder's Playful Laugh collection are a must and look great topped up with HighShine Lip Lacquer in Lilac Shine. Lauder finishes the look with palest pink on nails with High Gloss Lacquer in White Petal.

Humour in Jakob is down to earth

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The release of Jakob The Liar on video brings up a number of issues. First of all, who would have expected a Robin Williams film to do so poorly at the box office? Jakob The Liar took in some $5 million, which is considerably less than it cost the studio to promote the film, let alone the cost of actually producing it.

Secondly, there has been a great deal of controversy regarding the whole concept of Holocaust comedies and whether such films are in good taste. All of this began with the release of Life Is Beautiful. Then along came Jakob The Liar and Train of Life.

Personally I have no objection to comedies set during the Holocaust, provided they are done with taste and sensitivity. One of the best black comedies ever produced was Ernst Lubitsch's To Be Or Not To Be, a 1942 film that foreshadowed the tragedy experienced by European Jewry.

Jakob The Liar was originally conceived as a screenplay for East German television. When plans for the TV show fell through, Jurek Becker, a survivor of the Lodz Ghetto, rewrote it as a novel. The book sold well internationally and was made into a German-language film in 1974.

Peter Kassovitz, the director of the 1999 film, grew up in Nazi-occupied Hungary. While visiting his parents in Budapest in 1990, Kassovitz came across Becker's novel. After reading it, Kassovitz purchased an option for the English-language rights.

A new screenplay was written and sent to Robin Williams who enthusiastically agreed to play the part of Jakob Heym.

The film's story is rather simple and straight forward, although the moral questions it addresses are not. Jakob, a former café owner who specialized in making latkes, accidentally overhears a German radio broadcast stating that the Soviet Army was only 400 kilometres away from the ghetto.

Jakob hesitatingly tells the news to his friend Mischa and the information quickly makes its way through the ghetto. Suddenly, with prospects of liberation rising, the suicide rate in the ghetto drops to zero and hope for a better future increases.

But Jakob is afraid the Germans will find out about the non-existing radio and execute him. At the same time, he does not want to spread false hope.

Robin Williams as Jakob

Williams gives a very controlled and very sensitive performance. He never lets his manic side take over. The humour is down to earth and based on reality.

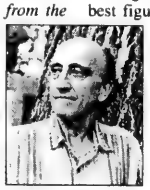
The supporting cast is superb. Hannah Taylor Gordon, who previously appeared in Four Weddings and a Funeral, was perfectly cast as Lina, the young girl who escapes from a train headed for the death camps, and who is taken in by Jakob. Her dark soulful eyes say more than any dialogue ever can.

Liev Schreiber, a young veteran of stage and screen, plays an ex-boxer who allows Jakob's secret out of the bag. Alan Arkin, Bob Balaban, Armin Mueller-Stahl and Nina Siemaszko all give powerful performances.

Epic poem on Caribbean exodus

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — American poet Laurence Lieberman, who has written a historical epic poem about the expulsion of Jews from the Caribbean island of St. Eustatius, read from his 12th volume of poetry, Flight from the Mother Stone (University of Arkansas Press) recently at Toronto's Harbourfront, the University of Toronto and McMaster University.



Laurence Lieberman

Lieberman's long poem Dark Songs: Slave House and Synagogue, which was published four years ago in a collection of the same name, tells the story of the little-known incident in which the Dutch Jewish community of St. Eustatius was forceably deported to the nearby island of St. Kitts in the era of the American Revolution.

A Haman-like figure in the British service, Rear Admiral Rodney, had convinced himself that the Jews were secretly assisting the Americans in their fight with the British. Seeking revenge, Rodney arranged a surprise police raid on the synagogue in the Upper Town of Oranjusted at the height of services on a Friday night.

In the poet's well-researched telling of the tale, all of the Jews were herded aboard a ship and deported within minutes.

"There is some question about the number," says Lieberman, a professor of English at the University of Illinois in Champaign-Urbana, who wrote the 25-stanza poem after visiting the ruins of the synagogue. "The best figure I could get was about 300. I'm surprised that this incident is not more widely known," he says.

Lieberman lived in St. Thomas for four years in the 1960s and has returned often to the Caribbean, which, he says, "has become a kind of spiritual homeland for me." He writes often about the Caribbean and is editor of a magazine, The Caribbean Writer, published in St. Croix.

"I have a particular interest in visiting the islands with a particular connection to Jewish history," he says. He has also written poems involving Jewish themes about the islands of Curacao, Aruba, Grenada and St. Thomas, among others.

Dark Songs: Slave House and Synagogue, which also evokes the horrors of the slave trade, was included in an anthology of Best American Poetry. It is to be reprinted in American Diaspora: Poets in Exile, an anthology due for publication later this year by the University of Iowa Press.

ICONS OF WAR: This famous photograph of a Soviet soldier raising the hammer and sickle over the Reichstag, one of a series taken after Soviet forces captured Berlin in 1945, was taken by Russian-Jewish war photographer Yevgeny Khaldei. Resolution for Palestinian refugees difficult, two films show

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

As the on-again, off-again Middle East peace process lurches one step forward and another step backward, the Palestinian refugee problem simmers, being one of the most vexing and intractable flashpoints confronting Israel and the Palestinians.

By one estimate, there are four million Palestinians still living in refugee camps in the Arab world. It's clear that their grievances may block a diplomatic settlement of the seething Arab-Israeli conflict.

David Ridgen, a Toronto filmmaker, has made two documentaries about this issue. They will be screened on Vision TV next month.

On the Borders of Gardens: Lebanon and On the Borders of Gardens: Israel will be aired on April 5 and April 12 at 9 p.m., respectively. The broadcasts honour United Nations Refugee Rights Day on April 4.

The films try to achieve a measure of objectivity, but ultimately, they are skewed slightly in favour of the Palestinians, the dispossessed in this case.

During the 1948 War of Independence, which pitted the newly formed state of Israel against several Arab armies and Palestinian irregulars, Palestinians by the tens of thousands fled. In some instances, they left voluntarily, occasionally at the urging of their leaders. At other times, they were pushed out, never to return again. The Palestinian Arabs who remained were granted Israeli citizenship.

Ridgen walks headlong into this political and human minefield with the aplomb of an inquiring reporter. He asks a number of explosive questions which animate his modus operandi: Who is responsible for creating the Palestinian refugee problem? Should the Palestinians be permitted to return?

There are no hard-and-fast answers or solutions, but the debate is never less than interesting.

On the Israeli side, revisionist Jewish historians such Benny Morris and Ilan Pappe are solicited for their views. Among others, Shimon Peres – the former prime minister – and Yoske Nachmias – an Irgun fighter – are also interviewed.

The Palestinians and their sympathizers in the West, academics ranging from Noam Chomsky to Norman Finkelstein, are given plenty of play.

And as the films unfold, a viewer is taken to refugee camps in Lebanon, given tours of former Arab homes and villages in Israel, and shown Israeli military positions in its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon.

Although Morris accuses Israel of having practised "benign ethnic cleansing" during the first Arab-Israeli war, he pours cold water on the notion that the refugees can go back to their homes.

Calling it an absurd and impractical idea, he explains that millions of Palestinians cannot be absorbed by Israeli society. Putting it in the starkest possible terms, he says that they can only return if Israel is destroyed. Seconding this view, Rex Bryden, a McGill University professor, declares that their return is simply unfeasible and, in effect, unattainable.

In a similar vein, Peres points out that Israel's Jewish character would be subverted by a wholesale return of Palestinians. "Forget it," Israel, he declares, won't commit suicide.

Pappe claims that Israel deliberately kicked out the Palestinians, but according to Peres' recollections, David Ben-Gurion, the first prime minister, instructed Israeli commanders not to displace them.

Casting aspersions on his claim, Morris asserts that Peres' memories are distorted and in defiance of the newest archival documents. Nachmias counters that the Palestinians were encouraged to leave by their elite. "My heart bleeds for them, but I can't have them back."

French Holocaust film strikes a strong chord

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

I'm Alive and I Love You, Roger Kahane's film that takes place during the Holocaust, will be screened at the Cumberland 4 theatre on Sunday, March 26, at 5:15 p.m.

It's one of 20 movies that will be shown at Cinefranco, the four-day film festival dedicated to French films starting on March 23. All the films have English subtitles.

Set in 1944, the last year of Nazi Germany's occupation of France, I'm Alive and I Love You turns on a note written by a Jew. The message accidentally falls into the hands of an unwitting French railway worker.

As he inspects a stretch of track, Julien finds a piece of paper under a deportation train crammed with hapless Jews. It reads, "I'm alive and I love you."

It is signed by Sarah, a Jewish woman who has been separated from her cute four-year-old son, Thibault.

The normally phlegmatic Julien is touched by the message. He attempts to deliver the note to Sarah's parents, but discovers that they, too, have been deported by the Germans.

Julien looks for Sarah, but before he can locate her, the train she is on pulls out of the station. Yet another Jew has been supposedly doomed by the Final Solution.

By chance, Julien stumbles across Thibault. He asks a neighbour to care for the boy, but is rebuffed. Left with no alternative, the kindly Julien decides to shelter him from the Germans.

Julien can identity with Thibault the orphan. His own father, a soldier, was killed in World War I, leaving him fatherless.

Throwing caution to the wind, Julien embarks on a long, tender trip with Thibault, hoping to ride out the storm.

The film, which at times is poignantly simple and unadorned, is a celebration of the human spirit under duress.

There are moments when it is frustratingly vague and confusing, but they pass quickly and a viewer regains his bearings.

I'm Alive and I Love You is anything but a great film, but it touches a deep-seated chord.

Refugee issue yet to be faced

Amira Hass, an Israeli journalist whose parents were Holocaust survivors and refugees, believes that Israelis have suppressed the issue. The director of an Israeli civil rights organization describes it as "the last taboo."

Finkelstein says that they have a right to return, while Chomsky fumes that the Olso peace process has offered the refugees zilch.

The Palestinians themselves are divided. Some yearn for the day they can return, while others are resigned to their fate. Hanan Ashrawi, a Palestinian spokesperson, suggests that Israel should admit them. Assad Rahman, a PLO official, likens the Palestinian refugees to victims and characterizes them as "the new Jews of the world."

Judging by these documentaries, the full complexity of the Palestinian refugee imbroglio has yet to be faced by Israel and the Palestinians.

Actor sisters star with Sigourney Weaver in film

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Kayla Perlmutter's fifth birthday party was a typical celebration, complete with candles, cake and presents. The location, however, was somewhat unusual.

In fact, the local actress, now "six-and-a-quarter" years old, was on location, with her family and the cast and crew of the recently released movie, A Map of the World, starring Sigourney Weaver, David Strathairn and Julianne Moore.

Kayla and her sister Dara, now 10, play Weaver's daughters in the drama about a woman (Weaver) who becomes a pariah in her Midwestern town after her friend's child drowns in a tragic accident while in her care. Things get worse before they get better, when Weaver's character is falsely accused of child molestation and jailed.

For Dara and Kayla, however, playing Emma and Claire in the movie was a very positive experience.

"I like acting, because I get to see myself on TV," giggled Kayla in a recent interview at the Perlmutter kitchen table.

She also liked playing with Dara between scenes, but definitely didn't like being licked by a cow during the movie's filming outside Toronto. "I only like doggies like [family pet] Casper," she said firmly.

"I like meeting new people," said Dara, "and being able to experience different ways you can act."

Dara's three-year professional career includes more than a dozen television and film credits. Her roles in Teacher Ate My Homework and the Jacqueline Susann Story (as the younger version of Michelle Lee, who played Susann) earned her nominations for Young Artists Awards of Hollywood.

Kayla has played Dara's younger sister or a younger version of Dara's character in four productions, including Seasons of Love, a mini-series in which she shared a scene with Hume Cronyn.

The girls share their love of acting with older sister Mindy, 12, an extra in Map who also performs in community musical theatre. They have appeared together on Skinnamarink TV, with Sharon, Lois & Bram.

The girls originally became involved in acting through a synagogue play. Dara and Mindy now sing in the Renanim Children's Chorus, for which their mother Robin is the piano accompanist. All three girls are also dancers.

Dara's role in Map of the World presented new challenges for her. "In other movies I haven't really screamed at my [screen] mom that loud...between the shoots I was always drinking water."

Offscreen, the tension vanished. "She [Weaver] helped me with my lines between shoots sometimes," Dara said.

Dara would like to pursue a career as an actress or a teacher, she said. Kayla wants to be a teacher and a singer.

The girls missed about four weeks of school for filming, but kept up with their work under the supervision of a tutor.

"Acting is a sideline," said the girls' father, Ron. "Going to school and being with friends is the main agenda."

Acting is "more of an extra-curricular activity," explained Robin.

But, added Dara, it's her favourite one.

Anne Frank.....

Before being captured by the Nazis, Anne Frank and her family hid in Amsterdam in quarters behind what had been the Franks' business premises prior to the occupation of Holland. The Anne Frank Museum now stands on that site. It addition to being a museum, it is a meeting place for young people.

Breathless in Bolivia: Fascinating Jewish connections

By GERRY SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

With visions of the photos and exotic words from my Grade 4 geography book back in the'50s, I found myself on the midnight flight from Miami to La Paz, Bolivia, last October.

Scenes of ladies in bowler hats with herds of llama and alpaca, the islands of Lake Titicaca and exotic subtropical villages danced in my head as the plane descended to El Alto Airport on the flat altiplano between the Andean peaks above La Paz. La Paz is one of the highest major cities in the world.

Landing at 6:30 a.m., one could see only the "moonscape" of the high plateau of the Andes and the snow-capped Mt. Illimani.

Bolivia, with only about eight million inhabitants, proved to be a land of contrasts and extremes.

Physically, both the topography and weather undergo many changes in very short distances. The scenery ranges from the high Andean plateaus to the subtropical and jungle-like Amazon to the sacred islands of the highest large navigable lake in the world – Lago Titicaca.

First to be explored is the unique city of La Paz, with over 1.2 million inhabitants – mainly indigenous people of the Quechua and Aymara speaking groups.

La Paz is located a few thousand feet below the international airport at the bottom of a V-shaped canyon with its main street called "El Prado" at the very bottom.

One is usually climbing up to get somewhere in La Paz and stopping to catch your breath. The women of the highlands called Cholas – in their colourful shawls and headgear – sell every product imaginable on the streets, from Chiclets to clothing to pots and pans.

Calle Sagarnaga is a colourful market street while Calle Jaen is the best for colonial architecture and museums. Entering La Paz at night from the surrounding higher plateaus is a wondrous sight.

Some 45 minutes from La Paz, by car, are the ancient Inca mystical ruins of Tiahuanaco.

A bus and short ferry ride in another direction is the town of Copacabana on the Bolivian side of Lake Titicaca.

This is the sacred lake of the Inca containing numerous islands including those of the sun and moon (Isla del Sol and Isla de la Luna) and it can be reached by ferryboat from the town.

While altitude sickness, or siroche, proved to be no problem for me, the intense sun off the lake did affect me for a few days.

About 40 percent of the lake lies in Bolivia with the balance in Peru. Besides Peru, Bolivia also has land borders with Chile, Argentina, Paraguay and Brazil.

A three-and-a-half-hour bus-ride from La Paz – over the crest of the Andes at some 4,800 metres, and down to some 600 metres – brings one to the subtropical Yungas region of Bolivia, midway to the Amazon basin in the eastern part of the country.

Getting to the main village of Coroico from La Paz along switchback unpaved roads just wide enough for a narrow bus or truck to squeeze by (with a few pulloffs) is an interesting trip and all in all, not too hair-raising, though it is not for the faint of heart.

At the end of the ride, one is rewarded with a beautiful village clinging to a hillside with ideal climate, hospitable people and beautiful flora.

I stayed at a former retreat of a Bolivian president that had been converted to a hotel, and even found a restaurant above the village run by a couple from France which had fantastic crepes.

The Jewish history in Bolivia is quite recent and unique. The present population has dwindled from an estimated onetime high in the '40s of some 15,000 to a current estimate of somewhere between 500 and 1,000 people.

They live mainly in La Paz, and are represented by an umbrella group called Circulo Israelita.

It is thought that some Spanish Conversos – Jews in Spain forced to convert during the Inquisition – were the first to reach Bolivia.

However, the first modern arrivals came about 1905 from Eastern Europe and were supplemented by refugees from Austria and Germany from 1938-41. Bolivia was one of the only countries in the world to admit Jews after Kristallnacht in 1938.

Moritz (Don Mauricio) Hochschild (1881-1965), an early settler in Bolivia, was a pioneer in tin mining. He personally rescued thousands of Jews from Germany by providing work permits, and tried to establish an agricultural community of Jews called Buena Terra in the Yungas region.

This project was abandoned in the '50s with the emigration of the Jewish population due to economic and political instability, the harsh climate and the lack of opportunities in higher education. There is still a Jewish community centre in La Paz as well as an Israeli embassy.

Bolivia has been home to both the famous and infamous. Among the former: Simon Patino, a tin mining magnate, and Jaime Escalante, an educator now residing in the United States and the subject of the film Stand and Deliver.

Among the latter non-Bolivians are Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid, who were bank robbers, Che Guevara, a doctor and revolutionary figure; and Klaus Barbie, the Gestapo chief known as the "Butcher of Lyon" who was responsible for the torture and death of many, including the deportation to Auschwitz of 44 Jewish children hidden in the mountain village of Izieu in France.

As Klaus Altmann, Barbie lived unmolested in Bolivia until he was finally deported back to France in 1987 where he died in prison in 1991.

There is a fascinating book, Hotel Bolivia, by Leo Spitzer. Spitzer was born in 1939 in La Paz and is the child of Austrian refugees from Nazism. His book chronicles the life and times of Jews in Bolivia in the '40s and '50s.

Though a bit remote and lacking the tourist infrastructure of other destinations, Bolivia is well worth a visit for its breathtaking scenery and hospitable people.

Most tourists enter from Peru but there are direct flights to La Paz on both LAB (Lloyd Aereo Boliviano) and American Airlines.
